18TH CONGRESS.] No. 259. [1ST SESSION.

ON THE MANNER OF SENDING SUPPLIES OF PROVISIONS AND CLOTHING TO THE UNITED STATES SQUADRON ON THE PACIFIC OCEAN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MAY 13, 1824.

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 15th April, requesting the President to cause to be communicated to the House a statement of the supplies which have been sent from the United States to any of the ports of South America, for the use of our squadrons on the Pacific ocean, of the amount paid for such supplies, with the names of the owners of the vessels, and other details therein specified, I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of the Navy, which, with the documents accompanying it, furnishes the information desired.

JAMES MONROE.

MAY 13, 1824.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 13, 1824.

Sir: In answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 15th of April, calling for information in relation to provisions and stores furnished to the squadron in the Pacific ocean, I have the honor to transmit a copy of a letter from the Commissioners of the Navy, dated 8th May, containing papers marked A, B, and C; copy of a letter from the Fourth Auditor, dated 6th May, accompanied by three statements marked D, E, and F, and a copy of a letter from the Fourth Auditor, dated the 8th May, in relation to the slop clothing shipped on board the America, for the United States ship Franklin, in the Pacific ocean; which contain, together, the information required by the resolution.

I am, with the highest respect, sir, yours, &c., &c.,

SAM. L. SOUTHARD.

The PRESIDENT of the United States.

NAVY COMMISSIONERS' OFFICE, May 8, 1824.

SIR: The Navy Commissioners have the honor of submitting the enclosed paper A, which furnishes the information in their possession, called for by the resolution of the honorable the House of Representatives of the 15th ult.

With regard to the shipment of slop clothing, authorized to be made in the ship America, the Commissioners beg leave to present:

Paper B, copy of a letter from Mr. Fitzgerald, purser of the Franklin, to the Commissioners, dated 21st September, 1821.

Paper C, copy of a letter from the board to Commodore Charles Stewart, dated 24th September, 1821, authorizing him to ship a few hogsheads of slop clothing to Valparaiso, in the ship America; which papers contain all the information in the possession of this office upon the subject.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

JNO. RODGERS.

A.

Exhibit showing the kind and quantity of provisions, stores, or supplies, shipped from the United States, for the use of our vessels of war, in the Pacific; the ports whence shipped; the names of the ships or vessels employed; the time when shipped; the freight agreed to be paid; and the names of the owner or owners of such ships or vessels.

Provisions, &c., shipped.	Ports whence shipped.	Names of the ships or vessels.	Time when shipped.	Freight agreed to be paid per barrel.	Names of the owners of such ships or vessels.

B.

NEW YORK, September 21, 1821.

SIR: At the request of Commodore Stewart, I am induced to address you on the subject of the slop clothing of the United States ship Franklin. The quantity required is so large, that room cannot be made for the stowing of it in hogsheads on board, and he has suggested the idea of sending a few hogsheads, (if it should meet your approbation,) to Valparaiso, by the ship America, which sails from this port in a few days.

Will you be good enough to inform me, sir, if this suggestion meet your approbation; and if it should, will you be pleased to give orders accordingly?

I have the honor to be, with great respect and esteem, your obedient servant,

EDW'D FITZGERALD, Purser.

Commodore JOHN RODGERS, President of the Board of Navy Commissioners.

C.

NAVY COMMISSIONERS' OFFICE, September 24, 1821.

SIR: Mr. Fitzgerald, purser of the Franklin, has suggested to this board, that the quantity of slop clothing required for the ship Franklin, is so large, that room cannot conveniently be made for the stowing of it in hogsheads on board, and that a few hogsheads might be shipped to Valparaiso in the ship America, which vessel will sail from New York in a few days. The Commissioners concur in this proposition, if you should advise it; and you will consider yourself authorized to have such part of the slop clothing, as cannot conveniently be shipped on board the Franklin, shipped accordingly in the America.

The Commissioners intend shipping by the Armenius, from Baltimore, 400 barrels of pork, for the use of the Franklin, and other vessels on the station to which you are proceeding; this pork will be delivered at Valparaiso.

I am, respectfully, &c., &c.,

JNO. RODGERS.

Commodore STEWART, New York.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Fourth Auditor's Office, May 6, 1824.

SIR: In pursuance of the resolution of the House of Representatives, under date of the 15th ult., calling on the President of the United States "to cause to be laid before the House any information he may possess, showing the kind and quantity of provisions, stores, or supplies of any kind, which have been sent from the United States to any of the ports of South America, on the Pacific ocean, for the use of vessels of war of the United States, designating the port from whence such supplies were sent, the name of the ship or vessel so employed, the time when, and the amount paid for such, and for the transportation thereof; likewise the name of the owner or owners of such ship or vessel; how and when paid; also the amount paid in such ports, by any officer or agent of this government, for supplies of any kind, for the vessels of war of the United States, stating the name and office of the person, the time when, the place where, and the mode of payment; whether in bills, notes or money; if in bills or notes, whether at par value, if not, at what discount or advance,"—I have the honor to transmit herewith, three several statements, exhibiting, so far as can be obtained from accounts received at this office, or from the records thereof, all the information required by said resolution.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. LEE, Auditor pro tem.

HON. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy.

* The ship Talbot sprung a leak at sea, was obliged to put into Montevideo. She was there condemned, and, on the 1st August, 1823, 600 barrels of flour, 300 barrels beef, 150 barrels pork, and 100 barrels bread, were reshipped on board the brig Winifred, for Valparaiso, the freight of which was to be $3,500. On her passage, 42 barrels flour, 30 barrels pork, and 20 barrels of beef were thrown overboard, as per protest; three barrels beef, and two barrels pork were consumed on board said brig, for which a deduction was made from the remaining part of the cargo, and the balance, say $3,279.97, was paid at Valparaiso, by the United States Navy agent, 24th of November, 1823.

NOTE.—The following port charges and other incidental expenses, accrued on the above-mentioned cargoes, on their arrival at Valparaiso, and paid for by the Navy agent at that place, viz:

On the cargo of the ship Armenius	$1,733 36
On the cargo of the ship Potosi	2,135 25
On the cargo of the brig Orion	1,409 86
On the cargo of the brig Winifred, being originally the cargo of the ship Talbot	355 00
Total	$5,633 47

George S. Wise, jr., claims the balance, but has been confined and too sick to attend to the settlement.
Edward N. Cox and J. L. Montaudevert claim that they are entitled to the balance. Cox's pay has been ordered to be stopped.
Samuel Hambleton has just returned from a cruise of more than two years in the Atlantic, and his pay is now ordered to be stopped.
George Beale, jr., gone to the Pacific. Balance will be stopped out of his pay.
Buller Cocke—in suit. Judgment in May term, 1823.
John M'Cauley—balance will be immediately paid. (It is now paid.)
John M'Cauley—the agent of John M'Cauley is now at the seat of government for the purpose of liquidating this amount, ($2,500.)

18TH CONGRESS.] No. 261. [2D SESSION.

APPLICATION OF A MEETING OF MERCHANTS AND CITIZENS OF NEW YORK, THAT PROTECTION BE GIVEN TO THE TRADE WITH CUBA AGAINST THE PIRATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE DECEMBER 13, 1824.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The citizens of New York solicit the attention of your honorable body to a subject of the deepest interest, affecting equally the commerce and revenue of the nation, the lives of our citizens, and the prosperity of a most respectable class of merchants.

The trade to the Island of Cuba has for many years been increasing, and has now become one of the most valuable branches of our foreign commerce. In its importance to the Union, it is not inferior to our trade with France and all her colonies. It is a most advantageous market for our produce and manufactures; furnishes us with many useful articles of consumption; employs a vast amount of American tonnage; is a nursery for our seamen, and yields a large revenue to our treasury. This trade was prosecuted until within a few years past, with but little interruption; but, in consequence of wars in the different Spanish provinces, which have had the effect greatly to weaken the sense of moral obligation, and from a partial suppression of the Spanish slave trade, many ferocious spirits have been put out of employment, and a class of men have arisen, and located themselves in different parts of that island, who seem, by their robberies and their cruelties, to emulate the bucaneers of former times.

The piracies of these men were confined, for a time, principally to plundering our vessels, and maltreating our seamen. By the exertions of the naval force, under Commodore Porter, their atrocities were rendered less frequent, and a hope was entertained that they would be entirely discontinued; but this hope has proved delusive. The necessary withdrawal of our ships of war during the sickly season, the supineness or connivance of the local authorities of Cuba, and the imbecility of the Spanish government, have conspired to renew the piratical system with increased activity and horror; whole crews have been recently murdered, their vessels burnt, and their cargoes plundered, and, in some instances, openly sold at the Matanzas or the Havana.

Without some protection in this trade, more efficient than any which has yet been afforded, and better adapted to repel the attacks of these abandoned men, we are apprehensive that this great branch of our foreign commerce, and the revenues arising from it, will be materially diminished. It is a lawful commerce, and our citizens have a right to claim the protection of government in its pursuit.

The system adopted by these bands of pirates, is to go out from their places of concealment in small open boats, attack unarmed vessels, and, by indiscriminate slaughter, to remove all chance of detection. A commerce liable to such risks cannot be prosecuted; merchants will be unwilling to expose their property, and seamen will not be willing to jeopardize their lives.

We have thus briefly stated the evils which threaten not only our direct trade to Cuba, but also our commerce to every part of the Gulf of Mexico. It is not too much to say, that they are too great to be endured; and, confiding in the wisdom and justice of your honorable body, we pray that suitable and effectual measures may be speedily devised to remove them.

We would respectfully submit to the consideration of Congress, whether it would not be expedient that a law should be passed, authorizing merchant vessels to arm, for their own protection, under such regulations, and with such rules for their government, as may appear necessary, and which may avoid the danger of committing the peace of the nation to the discretion of individuals.

And that the squadron on the Cuba station should be reinforced; that decoy vessels should be employed, and that the ships of war be furnished with additional launches and boats, calculated to pursue the pirates into their retreats and fastnesses.

We would further respectfully suggest, that the President of the United States be requested to make suitable remonstrances to the government of Spain, and to the authorities of Cuba, relative to the piracies committed on American vessels, and the murder of their crews, by persons issuing from the shores of that island; and to state, most implicitly, that if the evils are not removed, they will be held liable for the consequences.

Should such remonstrances be made, and should they be ineffectual, the citizens of New York pledge themselves to support their government in any ulterior measures which may be necessary, even if they extend to the blockade of every part of that island.

And your memorialists, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

A true copy of a memorial, unanimously adopted at a meeting of merchants and citizens of the city of New York, held at the Tontine Coffee House, on the 2d day of December, 1824.

NOMINATION OF PASSED MIDSHIPMEN TO BE LIEUTENANTS IN THE NAVY, AND REASONS FOR SUCH NOMINATION.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE DECEMBER 16, 1824.

IN EXECUTIVE SESSION:
SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, Thursday, December 16, 1824.

The following written message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Everett, his secretary:

To the Senate of the United States:

I nominate the following named persons, now passed midshipmen, to be promoted to the rank of lieutenant in the navy of the United States, in the order in which they stand:

D. H. Mackey, G. W. Carpender, J. L. Saunders, J. B. Hull, jr., Jott S. Payne, John E. Prentiss, Joseph Moorhead, Samuel B. Phelps, William T. Rodgers, Thomas Pettigru, Augustus Cutts, John S. Chauncey, Irvine Shubrick, Charles Ellery, Thomas R. Gerry, John Kelly, Hugh Dulany, Edmund Byrne, Edward S. Johnson, William H. Gardner, Frederick Garrett, David G. Farragut, R. S. Pinkney, Stephen B. Wilson, Edward C. Rutledge, William S. Harris, Thomas Dornin, Benjamin S. Grimke, John P. Tuttle, Robert B. Cunningham, James Glynn, Joseph Myers, William C. Wetmore, William B. Nicholson, Thomas R. Gedney, John Bubier, Victor M. Randolph, Joseph Cutts, jr., Jacob Crowninshield, Frederick Engle, Thomas S. Brown, Alexander J. D. Brown, Jesse Smith, John H. Smith, Merrit S. Scott, Francis Sanderson, John Rudd, Robert Ritchie, David R. Stewart, William W. McKean, Benjamin Tallmadge, jr., Franklin Buchanan, H. H. Hobbs, Samuel Mercer, Charles Lowndes, Duncan N. Ingraham, John Marston, jr., Henry Bruce, William D. Newman, A. B. Pinckham, William H. Homer, James D. Knight, Joseph Mattison, William S. Walker, Alexander Slidell, James S. Boughan, George F. Pearson.

JAMES MONROE.

The message was read.

Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, to consider and report thereon; and that the document accompanying it be printed under an injunction of secrecy.

Document accompanying the message of the President of the United States, nominating midshipmen.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, December 6, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor respectfully to present to you the list of passed midshipmen, and to express an opinion that they ought, and wish that they may be nominated to the Senate for promotion to the rank of lieutenant.

To encourage emulation, to sustain moral character, and insure improvement in professional skill, the Department, for several successive years, appointed a board of competent officers, to examine midshipmen of a particular age in the service. All of the age specified were required to offer themselves for this examination, and if they failed to do so, without a satisfactory excuse, they were to be considered out of the service. The understanding of these young officers, of their friends and the public was, that they should, at an early day after their examination, be promoted, if their character and conduct were found to be correct, and they exhibited a proper degree of professional skill. Some of them did pass the examination in the first years, and were promoted. Others were examined in 1820, '21, '22, who have not yet received commissions. Most of them are skillful and highly meritorious, and it seems due to them that their promotion be no longer delayed. Since their examination, also, many officers of the higher grades have died and resigned, amounting in number, probably to more than those now proposed for promotion; and it has often happened within the last two years, that the services of most of these midshipmen have been necessary in the character of lieutenants, and they have temporarily acted as such. Their services in that capacity will, no doubt, be equally necessary hereafter.

The appointment to discharge duties above their rank has created, and will continue to create, inconveniencies, which it would be pleasant both to them and to the Department to avoid.

The following principles have been regarded in fixing the order in which they are proposed to be nominated and to bear rank:

1st. Where the board of examination fixed the order of their respective merits, this order is followed; this was done in 1819, '20 and '21.

2d. Where the board did not do this, as in 1823, they are to stand according to the date of their warrants, there being no other rule by which the rank can be determined.

3d. No officer is to suffer in his rank by the act of the Department, where he himself is not in fault. For example, where the date of an officer's warrant would have justified his being examined at any particular examination, but he was absent from the United States, by order of the Department, at the time of that examination, and presented himself before the board, at the first opportunity after his return, and passed respectably, he is placed with those who passed in the year when he might have been examined, had he been present. All whose warrants were older than 1st January, 1814, were entitled to examination in 1820; if any were absent then, but passed respectably in 1821, they ought to be placed with those in the list of 1820.

Regarding these rules, those on the list of 1820 are proposed to be nominated in the order in which they stand, and in which they were placed by the board.

In the list of 1821, Samuel B. Phelps, W. T. Rodgers, Thomas Pettigru, Augustus Cutts, and J. S

Chauncey, are found, who were old enough to be examined in 1820, but were absent under the orders of the Department, and passed respectably at the first examination after their return; they are, therefore, placed next after the list of 1820; then follows the rest of 1821, in the order in which they stand, and were arranged by the board. Then follow those of 1823, in the order of their dates of warrant; the board having neglected to arrange them in the order of merit, and it having been found impossible to obtain from the officers composing it a safe and satisfactory statement of their relative merits.

There are others in 1821, who were entitled to examination in 1820; but they either did not apply, or, applying, did not pass; they are left, therefore, in 1821, in the order in which the board placed them.

Those examined in 1822 were all of an age to pass in 1821, the date of warrant justifying an examination being the same in both, April 1st, 1815; but they either applied and were rejected, or were absent from the country. Of the latter class were Robert Ritchie, David R. Stewart, Wm. W. McKean, Benjamin Tallmadge, jr., H. H. Hobbs, Samuel Mercer, Franklin Buchanan, and Charles Lowndes.

Some of these last claim to take rank with those who passed in 1821, according to the date of their warrants. But it is impossible so to arrange the list without destroying the principle of promotion by merit. If they are so placed, all must be placed according to date of warrant, which would be destructive of the whole object of the examinations; or, if all are not arranged by date of warrant, then these would be before others who are older in date of warrant than themselves. The operation of this course will be better understood by taking a single case.

Midshipman McKean passed in 1822, being out of the country in 1821. He claims to be placed as high as any on the list of 1821, whose warrant is of the same date. His warrant is dated 30th Nov., 1814. The warant of Hugh Dulany is of the same date. If, therefore, you place midshipman McKean next to midshipman Dulany, he will be placed before a large number on the list of 1821, older than himself; an injustice for which no plausible reason could be assigned. To avoid this, and other evils, it is believed to be most just to all, to place those who were out of the country in 1821, immediately after those who passed at that time, and before those who were rejected, taking it for granted that they would have passed had they been here in 1821; which is a liberal and fair presumption in their favor. By this arrangement, none of those who passed in 1822 can have, before them, more than four or five whose warrants are not older; and these four or five might or might not have been preferred to them, had all been present at the examination of 1821; it is, therefore, an arrangement nearer to truth and justice, than any other which can be devised.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

SAM. L. SOUTHARD.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE DECEMBER 30, 1824.

UNITED STATES COMMERCIAL AGENCY.

Be it known that, on the day of the date hereof, before me, John Mountain, vice commercial agent of the United States of America, at the city of Havana, personally came and appeared George Brown, of New York, seaman, aged 21 years and upwards, who, being duly sworn by me, according to law, upon his solemn oath did depose, declare, and say, that he was acting and employed in the capacity of seaman, on board of the brig Laura Ann, of New York, ——— Shaw, master, last from Buenos Ayres, with a cargo of jerked beef, bound to the port of Havana; that, on the night of the 20th day of October last past, they made the Island of Cuba, and on the next morning, being the 21st day of October, when about twelve miles to leeward of Matanzas, they were boarded by an open boat, with twelve men, armed with muskets, cutlasses, pistols, and knives, who ordered the captain into the cabin, fired two pistols, and drove the mate and seamen into the forecastle, and, in a few minutes, ordered three of the men out of the forecastle, and compelled them to take in the studding sails and brace up the yards, and running the vessel close in shore, near to Port de Canase, came to anchor, and, for an hour, the vessel beat heavy on the rocks; at this time, a schooner boat, armed with 1 gun, and 28 to 30 men, also armed, came alongside, appearing to be a party with the boat's crew, came on board and joined them, immediately ordered the second mate on board the schooner, and to make two masts for the boat; he, accordingly, obeyed their orders, and went on board. The pirates now numbered about 40 men; they called the captain upon deck and asked him where his money was; the captain replied that he was a poor man, and had not any money; they tied him (the captain) to the windlass, and beat him very severely, then untied him, and driving him into the forecastle, called the mate upon the deck, tied him to the windlass, and beat him in a like manner; then driving him below, ordered all the sailors to come upon deck; after the sailors came up, they were ordered aloft to furl the sails, which being done, they were again ordered into the forecastle; after all hands being below about an hour, three seamen were ordered upon deck; this deponent being one of the three, he went up into the foretop to unreef the maintopsail braces; it being in the dusk of the evening; as this deponent came down, he saw that the pirates were running the captain up to the larboard fore yardarm, being hung by the neck; as soon after as possible, this deponent ran into the forecastle, and immediately the mate was called upon deck, and this deponent heard him only say "Oh God!" They then called the cook upon deck, afterwards the sailors, one at a time; this deponent stowing himself away in the coal hole, where he remained hid, notwithstanding they searched for him with lanterns, without finding him, until he was compelled to leave his hiding place by the fire; when, on his going upon deck, and finding the vessel on fire, and burning as far forward as the fore-hatch, he dropped himself overboard, under the vessel's bows, and swam ashore, distant about sixty yards, accompanied by two sharks, one swimming on each side of him. After reaching the shore, and walking about three miles, he, being much fatigued, lay in the wood for the night, and on the following morning saw the same piratical boat board and take possession of a brig under American colors, this deponent remaining in the wood until the next morning, when he commenced his walk, making for Matanzas, keeping near the sea shore; coming to a small river, where there were many stores and small schooners, he swam across the river, and in the continuation of his walk, fell in with a small town, or place, and twenty persons, who, after questioning this deponent, who he was, and where he was going, some of them threatening to take his life, suffered him to proceed, and, on Saturday night, the 24th, reached a farm house, where he remained until Monday morning, when the farmer, having to send produce of his farm to Matanzas, on horses, and this deponent's feet being much cut, allowed him to ride on one of the horses, and at about 10 o'clock of the same day he reached Matanzas.

Signed and sworn to before me, the said vice commercial agent. In faith whereof, I have hereunto subscribed my name, and affixed the seal of my office, at Havana aforesaid, this sixteenth day of November, 1824, and of the Independence of the United States of America the forty-ninth.

18TH CONGRESS.] No. 264. [2D SESSION.

REASONS OF THE PRESIDENT FOR DECLINING TO FURNISH THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES WITH DOCUMENTS RELATING TO THE CONDUCT OF OFFICERS OF THE NAVY ON THE PACIFIC OCEAN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES 10TH OF JANUARY, 1825.

To the House of Representatives:

I should hasten to communicate to you the documents called for by the resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 4th instant, relating to the conduct of the officers of the navy of the United States, on the Pacific ocean, and of other public agents in South America, if such a communication might now be made consistently with the public interest, or with justice to the parties concerned. In consequence of several charges which have been alleged against Commodore Stewart, touching his conduct while commanding the squadron of the United States on that sea, it has been deemed proper to suspend him from duty, and to subject him to trial on those charges. It appearing, also, that some of those charges have been communicated to this Department, by Mr. Prevost, political agent, at this time, of the United States, at Peru, and heretofore at Buenos Ayres and Chili, and apparently with his sanction; and that charges have likewise been made against him, by citizens of the United States engaged in commerce in that quarter; it has been thought equally just and proper that he should attend here, as well to furnish the evidence in his possession, applicable to the charges exhibited against Commodore Stewart, as to answer such as have been exhibited against himself. In this stage, the publication of those documents might tend to excite prejudices, which might operate to the injury of both. It is important that the public servants, in every station, should perform their duty with fidelity, according to the injunctions of the law, and the orders of the Executive in fulfillment thereof. It is peculiarly so that this should be done by the commanders of our squadrons, especially, on distant seas, and by political agents who represent the United States with foreign powers, and for reasons that are obvious, in both instances. It is due to their rights and to the character of the government that they be not censured without just cause, which cannot be ascertained, until, on a view of the charges, they are heard in their defence, and after a thorough and impartial investigation of their conduct. Under these circumstances, it is thought that a communication, at this time, of those documents, would not comport with the public interest, nor with what is due to the parties concerned.

ON THE USE OF AMERICAN CANVAS, CABLES AND CORDAGE IN THE NAVY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE JANUARY 10, 1825.

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with the resolution of the Senate, of the 17th May last, I transmit a report from the Secretary of the Navy, which contains the information requested.

JAMES MUNROE.

WASHINGTON, January 5, 1825.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, January 5, 1825.

SIR: In answer to the resolution of the Senate of the United States of the 17th May last, "that the President of the United States be requested to cause a report from the Secretary of the Navy to be laid before the Senate at the commencement of the next session of Congress, showing the reason, if any, why canvas, cables, and cordage, made of hemp, the growth of the United States, may not be used in the equipment of national vessels, with equal advantage as if of foreign fabric or materials," I have the honor to present to you the following report:

The resolution was communicated to the Board of Navy Commissioners, who have furnished the answer marked A.

A variety of questions were proposed to growers and manufacturers of hemp, and answers received, from which the extracts marked No. 1 to 5 are taken.

From these and other sources of information, the following conclusions are drawn:

1st. That hemp may be cultivated in the United States to any extent which our necessities may require.

2d. That, in the present mode of cultivation, there are some errors, which may readily be corrected when more attention is paid to it.

3d. That, in its natural state, it is, in all important qualities, equal to that which we are in the habit of importing.

4th. That it is injured in the mode of rotting and preparing it for manufacture.

5th. That, if sown thicker on the ground, water-rotted, and prepared with care, it will be, for all purposes, equal to any other.

6th. That canvas, cables, and cordage, manufactured out of it, as now cultivated, are inferior in color, strength and durability, to those manufactured from imported hemp, and consequently are not as safe or proper for use in the navy. And this is the reason, and the only reason, "why canvas, cables, and cordage, made of hemp, the growth of the United States, may not be used in the equipment of national vessels, with equal advantage as if of foreign fabric or materials."

I have the honor to be, with sentiments of high respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD.

To the PRESIDENT of the United States.

A.

NAVY COMMISSIONERS' OFFICE, November 17, 1824.

SIR: The Commissioners of the Navy have received a copy of the resolution of the honorable the Senate of the United States, of 17th May last, calling for a report, "at the commencement of the next session of Congress, showing the reason, if any, why canvas, cables, and cordage, made of hemp, the growth of the United States, may not be used in the equipment of national vessels with equal advantage as if of foreign fabric or materials."

Early after the passage of this resolution, the Commissioners opened an extensive correspondence with persons engaged in the manufacture of canvas and cordage, and they have consulted all the authorities within their reach, with the view to gain such information upon the interesting question embraced by the resolution as would assist in forming satisfactory conclusions; and they now respectfully submit the following report:

The Commissioners beg leave to premise that the canvas manufactured in the United States is made generally of flax. They believe that hemp has not been used for that purpose in any of the large factories; though it has been suggested that, if hemp were sowed unusually thick, and pulled at a period to produce a fibre or hurl, on a medium between the ordinary hemp and flax, that is, stouter and stronger than the latter, yet not so coarse and rough as the former, it might be found to be an advantageous substitue in the manufacture of canvas.

With regard to flax for the manufacture of canvas, there can be no doubt that the American plant, if water-rotted and properly dressed, will make a cloth which may be used in the equipment of our national vessels with equal advantage as if of foreign fabric or materials. We have purchased a considerable quantity of canvas made in the United States, of flax grown at Fairfield, Connecticut, where they "are in the habit of water-rotting it," and its quality is not only considered sufficiently good for the service, but equal to that of the best imported canvas. We have also purchased canvas made from foreign and dew-rotted American flax, mixed, and it has passed inspection, though not equal to that made from the Fairfield flax.

The manufacturers of canvas object to dew-rotted flax on various grounds. They prefer Dutch at 15 or Irish at 14 cents per pound to this kind of flax at 9 cents per pound; because, while one hundred pounds of Dutch will yield 72 pounds, and one hundred pounds of Irish will yield 65 pounds, the like quantity of American dew-rotted will yield only 40 pounds of clean flax. No reason can be discerned why the American flax should yield so much less than the Dutch, unless it is to be found in the defective process of rotting, dressing, and preparing it for market. The American plant, in its natural state, contains, it is believed, as great a portion of fibre or lint as either of the others. A respectable manufacturer has stated that he has long used the Fairfield flax, and that he considers it "more flexible, less woody, and stronger than that grown at the south, and preferable to Russia flax."

Other, and apparently well founded, objections are urged by the manufacturers of canvas against common American flax. They say that in bleaching, the Irish flax has an advantage over every other description; that the coloring matter is extracted from it with less trouble and expense than the Dutch; that the American flax requires at least two-thirds more expense and twice the trouble of any other flax. The reason assigned for this by the American manufacturers is, that the American flax is not pulled until the seed are ripe; whereas in Ireland it is pulled green; but, in opposition to this conclusion, it is said that "in the Netherlands, where flax is supposed to be the best prepared, generally speaking, of any in Europe, and in France, flax is always allowed to arrive at maturity, and is never pulled, particularly in Holland and Zealand, until the seed are perfectly formed and the capsule brown and hard, so as to be easily disengaged from the stalk;" and if, as is alleged, Irish flax is found to be more easily bleached than the Dutch, this advantage appears to be more than counterbalanced by the fact that 100 pounds of the latter will yield 7 pounds more of clean flax than an equal quantity of the former.

The practice of pulling the plant in a green state is defended on the grounds that the younger the plant the finer the tissue; yet it is stated as an unquestionable fact, that the flax intended for the finest purposes is not pulled in the Netherlands until the seed are ripe. An intelligent French gentleman, in a letter to Mr. Besnard, (an extract of which will be found among the papers accompanying this report,) assigns reasons which appear conclusive in favor of the practice which prevails in Holland, both as to the period when flax is pulled, and their peculiar method of steeping it.

The "high price of American flax, its unequal quality, and the uncertainty of supply," are urged as among the reasons which have induced some of the manufacturers of canvas, after repeated trials, to recommence the importations of Irish flax; while others observe that they have imported none since the fall of 1821, being able to obtain a sufficient supply of American flax.

It appears to be the universal opinion of experienced men that the process of dew-rotting flax diminishes its value and its weight, injures its color, and impairs its quality and strength. The experiments stated in the paper C, annexed, tend to confirm this opinion.

With regard to "cables and cordage, made of hemp the growth of the United States," many of the observations previously made with respect to flax are, in a great degree, applicable to hemp. In its natural state, American is believed to be equal to the best Russia; but the almost universal custom of dew-rotting it is so deleterious in its effects upon the fibre as to present insuperable objections to its use in the navy. This process not only weakens the fibre, but prevents the tar from incorporating with the yarns, thus rendering it seriously objectionable, particularly for cables. The manufacturers of cordage further object to it, because "its staple is rough and occupies more time in the manufacture," and "generally comes to market in a slovenly manner, with various qualities mixed together, and badly cleaned." They say that cordage made of Russia hemp is preferred by the consumer, at an advance of fifty to one hundred per cent.; that dew-rotted cordage, "by exposure to the atmosphere, becomes rotten, and after being used a short time, cannot be depended on." A gentleman of experience says: "Before the late war we used some cordage made from Kentucky yarns—many persons did it for the purpose of encouraging American productions; some of them had strong prejudices in its favor; but, after a fair trial, those persons confessed to me that they must give up the use of it; that it would not wear well, and they could not depend on it." The same gentleman further observes: "I would not use cordage made of Kentucky yarn or hemp, even if I could procure it at half the price of cordage made from Russia."

Manufacturers and consumers of cordage appear universally to concur in these opinions. Equally decided is their opinion as to the quality of the American plant in its natural state. They all say that American hemp, pulled in the right season, water-rotted, and properly handled, would make as good cordage as the best Russia. Indeed, it has been forcibly contended that it would be preferable, because Russia hemp is injured from being heated on ship board—an injury to which American hemp, used in the United States, would not be liable.

While these opinions appear well founded, there is another consideration which addresses itself immediately and forcibly to the growers of hemp in the United States. The difference between the product of given portions of plant, water-rotted and dew-rotted, is confidently believed to be greatly in favor of the former mode.

Experiments have been made by boiling and steaming, to avoid either process of rotting; but the result proved unsatisfactory.

Pushing their experiments with a perseverance which deserves and must ultimately secure success, our countrymen have lately introduced a machine called "the flax and hemp dresser," with a view to avoid altogether the process of rotting. The power of this machine, to disengage effectually the woody part of the plant from the lint, is spoken of confidently by those who have seen it in operation; but whether the hemp thus prepared will be as serviceable as the water-rotted, whether it will not be more liable, in bulk, to injury from the gum and mucilage which are wholly left in it, or whether other objections may not exist, are points upon which the Commissioners are uninformed. They have, however, engaged a small supply of yarns from hemp thus prepared, and intend making experiments to test their strength and durability.

About twelve months since, a gentleman produced a sample of cordage, made, it is believed, of American dew-rotted hemp, with the yarns dipped in pyroligneous acid, and tarred about one-eighth as much as yarns usually are, prior to being laid; calculating that the antiseptic properties of this acid would obviate the injuries sustained in the process of dew-rotting, and impart to the cordage a durability equal to that made of water-rotted hemp. With a view to an experiment, the Commissioners have engaged enough of these yarns to make a nine-inch cable. Although the gentleman speaks very confidently as to the durability of cordage made from these yarns, yet we are unable to discern how the pyroligneous acid can remedy the defects occasioned by dew-rotting, and impart to the cordage the property of retaining a sufficient portion of tar for its preservation, particularly when used as cables.

The proceedings of Congress, during their last session, and the opinions then expressed, that American hemp, in its natural state, is equal to Russia, and that the preference given to the latter has arisen essentially from the manner in which it is rotted, have induced some of our most respectable farmers to engage in the cultivation and preparation of hemp, upon the Russian system. The commissioners have contracted for three tons of American hemp of this description, and directed it to be made into cordage of various kinds, in order to test its comparative strength and durability with the best Russia, on board the ship North Carolina. The result of this experiment, if the American hemp shall have been carefully gathered, at the right season, and properly prepared, will enable the Commissioners to express a satisfactory opinion upon the subject; and they cannot entertain a doubt that, in such case, it will be in their power to say that the American water-rotted hemp is in all respects fully equal to the best Russia.

With regard to "the places where, and the extent to which, hemp may be cultivated," in the United States, it may be unreservedly said that the climate throughout the whole country is nowhere unfriendly, and that hemp may be cultivated advantageously wherever the soil is adapted to it. It is grown in great perfection in the eastern, western and southern States, as far south as, and including, Virginia. We have not heard of any growth south of Virginia, though, as it is known to succeed well in warm latitudes, there is no doubt it can be cultivated in our most southern States.

The papers herewith (A, B, C and D) will, it is hoped, afford satisfactory information upon the "manner of raising hemp and preparing it for market," and upon the other points to which you have been pleased to call the attention of the board.

Having given to this important subject that attention to which its intrinsic merits entitle it, and which a strong solicitude to contribute to the improvement of every source of national independence could not fail to excite, the Commissioners, with great deference, submit the result.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

JOHN RODGERS.

On the culture and preparing the hemp in Russia, transmitted by the Hon. J. Q. Adams, minister at St. Petersburg, March, 1810.

In Russia, when the season is mild, the hemp seed is sown about the 1st June, old style. The richer the soil of the land employed for it, the better. A chetwirt of seed, (100 chetwirts are equal to 73 quarters, Winchester measure,) is sown on a piece of land of 80 fathoms (English feet) long, and 60 fathoms broad.

The land is first ploughed and harrowed, and about 200 single horse loads of dung being spread upon it, it is left for six days, when it is again ploughed, and the seed sown and harrowed the same day. In about four months the seed becomes ripe, and the hemp is then pulled up with the roots; if it be allowed to remain too long in the ground, it is apt to become harsh. It is bound into heads or bunches of four handfuls each; these are hung upon sticks placed horizontally, thus: X–0–0–0–0–0–0–X, and allowed to remain so for two days. It is then made into cut or thrashed hemp, as may be agreeable. The cut hemp is made by chopping off the heads containing the seed. These are put into the kiln, and, after remaining there for eighteen hours, the seed is beaten out.

If thrashed hemp is to be made, the heads or tops must not be cut off, but the bunches of hemp placed entire in the kiln; and, if the weather be warm, it will be sufficiently dry in three days, when the seed must be thrashed out of the heads. In either case, three days after the seed is separated from it, the hemp must be put to steep or rot, either in a stream or a pond, and, that the hemp may be entirely immersed, it is put under wooden frames [═══], upon which stones are placed, or, where they are not to be had, earth is substituted, after the frames are covered with planks.

The clearer and purer the color of the water, the better will be the color of the hemp. Where the water is warm, three weeks' steeping will be sufficient, but, if cold, as in rivers, springs, &c., five weeks or longer may be necessary. At the expiration of this period, a head of the hemp is taken out and dried; if, on beating and cleaning it, the husk comes off, the hemp may then be taken out of the water, but if the husk still adheres to it, it must be allowed to remain some time longer. This trial must be repeated from time to time, till the husk separates, when the hemp must be taken out of the water, and suspended to dry, as directed before, on its being taken off the ground,

The hemp is now made into the two sorts distinguished by the names of spring and winter hemp, the former being dry and rather of a withered appearance, the latter more moist, and of a fine brownish green color, containing more of the vegetable oil, and, therefore, the more apt to heat, though, if not shipped at St. Petersburg or Riga before September, there is not much risk of its heating any more on board the ships, especially on short voyages, as to England, and are the best fit for cables. If it be intended that the hemp should be early ready for the market, it is made into winter hemp by the following process: On being taken out of the water, it is left suspended in the open air for about a fortnight, when it is put into the kiln for twenty-four hours, after which it is broken by means of a hand-mill, and the husk is then beaten off by striking the heads obliquely with iron and wooden instruments of the shape of a large two-edged knife; lastly, to unravel it, it is drawn through a wooden comb, or card, with one row of wide wooden teeth, fixed perpendicularly.

The hemp is then laid up or suspended in sheds, and is fit to be sorted, bound into bundles, and loaded into the barks.

The hemp, to be prepared as spring hemp, is allowed to remain suspended, and exposed to the weather the whole winter, until it be dried by the sun in the spring, when it is broken and cleaned in the same manner as the winter hemp.

As the greatest part of the summer elapses before it can be made fit for the market, none of this hemp reaches St. Petersburg until the following spring, that is, two years after it was sown.

The hemp is sown in the same manner as linseed, rye, or wheat. Land of a sandy soil may also be employed for it, but it must be strongly manured, otherwise it will be too short, and a flat country should always be preferred.

One chetwirt of seed commonly yields 25 loads (upwards 36 pounds English) of hemp, and twelve chetwirts of hemp seed.

B.

Observations relative to hemp.

Taken from the American Farmer, vol. 5.

The following observations relative to hemp are said to be approved by the experience of practical men in our own country, particularly Mr. Henry Kip, of Buffalo.

Hemp is a very hardy plant, resists drouth and severe frosts, is easier cultivated, less exhausting, and more profitable than many other crops, with which this does not interfere in its cultivation, (except the tobacco crop.) It is sown before, and gathered after, corn, and requires no attention when wheat is sown, harvested, or thrashed. It will grow year after year, on the same ground, on which, if sufficiently rich, it is the surest crop. It is liable to no diseases, and injured by no insects.

The soil.

The soil should be deep, clean, dry, rich, and mellow. The plant has a tap-root, which descends to a considerable depth, and therefore the soil should be deep, and be thoroughly mellowed by deep and frequent ploughings. Fall ploughing, and two or three ploughings in the spring, together with harrowing, so as to smooth the surface, (and thereby enable the seed to be sown even, and the hemp to spring up equally, and be cut close to the roots,) are preparatory steps to the putting in of the seed.

The seed when sown.

The seed (to the amount of two bushels per acre, on middling soil, and three on rich ground,) should be sown as early as possible in the spring, after the ground becomes dry and well prepared. Early sowing renders the coat heavier and stronger, enables the hemp to cover the ground early, so as to smother weeds, and, before the sun becomes powerful, to shade the soil and preserve its moisture. The seed, after being cast as even as possible, should be harrowed in, to as equal a depth as may be, that it may all start together; and a heavy roller should then be passed over, or a brush drawn across, to smooth the surface, in order that the hemp may be cut close to the roots.

Ripening and harvesting.

When the hemp becomes fit to be cut, the stalks of the blossom, or male hemp, turn yellow, become a good deal speckled, and drop most of their leaves, and, if the air is still, a cloud of dust arises from the blossom stalks, and hangs over the field. When sown early, it will be fit to cut about the 1st of August. The above appearance will become indicative of the proper time, and then it should be cut without delay; for, if suffered to stand longer, (as about one-half of the stalks blossom, and the other half bear seed,) the stalks of the male will wither and blacken, and the coat be of but little value; and the female hemp, which has stood to ripen the seed, requires a longer time to rot than the male, and, consequently, both would be thereby injured. The best way to get seed would be to sow some thinly in a separate patch. The mode of cutting is preferable to that of pulling; a man will cut half an acre per day, and a quarter, pulled, is said to be a day's work. By the former practice, the inconvenience of dust, and the dirt attached to the roots, will be avoided. Cut hemp will be worth ten dollars a ton more than the pulled. Knives, or hooks, for that purpose, may be obtained for about $1.25 each. When cut, spread the hemp a day or two, to dry it, then bind it, and put it up in shocks.

Wretting (or rotting.)

As soon as harvested, in order to prevent the rains from discoloring it, proceed, as early as convenient, to wret it, by placing it in clean, pure water, formed by a stream, spring, or clear pond. If rotted shortly after cutting, about five days are generally required for the purpose. You will be able to judge, by taking out a handful and drying it, and if the stalk of sheaves will shake out, and separate easily from the bark, leaving it clean and entire, the process of wretting is completed. The bark, or lint of hemp, is connected with the stalk by a substance which must be either wretted or dissolved before they will separate; produce the separation, and the work is accomplished. Experience will be the best criterion. The water in which it is rotted should not run rapidly, as it would, in that case, wash away the coat. You may have three or four wagon loads of hemp, to the depth of three or four feet, sunk at a time, but it should be completely submerged, though not suffered to touch the bottom. If separate quantities are put in on several successive days, the days and quantities should be noted, for the purpose of ascertaining which becomes first wretted, and which should, therefore, be first taken up; for, if left in the water a day or two too long, the hemp will be materially injured.

Dressing and securing.

When rotted, open and spread it, that it may dry soon. The process for breaking and swingling is the same as that for flax. When it grows too long for dressing (say from eight to ten feet) it may be cut into two equal parts without any injury. Be very particular in keeping the long and short hemp separate, and not have the seed and but ends put together; be also careful to dress it clean. When dressing it, put twelve handfuls in one head, laying them straight, the length of the hemp. The handfuls must not be tied, but bind the heads tight with a small band, about one foot from the but end; it will then be ready to be put into such sized bales as may be suitable. Some bale it into a box, across the bottom of which four ropes are laid to tie the hemp when pressed into it. When packed, it should be perfectly dry, otherwise it will rot.

The following remarks from the "Plough Boy," on the subject of water-rotting in preference to dew-rotting, coincide with the opinion of experienced cultivators. "If the crop is to be dew-rotted and got out by hand, its profits must be comparatively small, because it cannot be thus prepared to command the highest price in market, compete in quality with the Russia hemp, much less drive it from our markets. But, if the American hemp planter be prepared with proper machinery to dress and prepare it, we ought not to doubt, much less to despair, of his ultimately arriving at a perfection in the production and dress of the article, to equal, if not excel, the best samples of Russia hemp."

C.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Naman Goodsell to Mr. Samuel Swartwout, April, 1823.

Taken from the American Farmer, vol. 5.

I am prepared to show that water-rotting, in all cases where it can be done, is, most unquestionably, to be preferred. 1st. It is more durable for all the purposes to which it is applied; a fact perfectly well known to those who manufacture sack and cordage. 2d. It is more easily bleached; and, 3d. It will yield a greater quantity of fibre from a given quantity of the plant. My own experiments with respect to the superior durability of water-prepared flax were very satisfactory. I placed on the ground a quantity of flax that had been sufficiently water-rotted, for dressing, by the side of an equal quantity of unrotted flax, and turned them once in three days, until the new flax was sufficiently rotted for dressing also, and, upon examination, I found that that which had been previously water-rotted had lost none of its strength, and that it had not altered in any respect, except in its color, which was a little brighter than when laid out; both parcels were now suffered to remain upon the ground, until the dew-rotted became worthless, when the water-rotted was found to be still strong and good.

I repeated these experiments with dressed flax, and with the plant, and found the result the same. This, in my mind, fully established the very important fact, that water-rotted flax or hemp is infinitely superior to that which is dew-rotted.

I made an attempt next to ascertain the proportionate loss in weight in each process of rotting, and found them both nearly equal, viz: about twenty-five per cent.; but I found, at the same time, that the produce of this equal quantity of plant differed materially in weight. When it came to be dressed, the dew or land-rotted averaged from 12 to 16 pounds of fibre only, whilst the water-prepared gave from 16 to 25 per cent. This difference in weight I consider to be quite sufficient to defray the extra expense of water-rotting, whilst the value of the article would be enhanced one-third more. My strong desire to investigate this subject fully, induced me to make other trials, by boiling and steaming, in order to avoid the rotting process altogether, but I did not succeed in any of them sufficiently to warrant their recommendation to the public. On the contrary, I became convinced that neither would answer.

My next investigation was an attempt to ascertain the nature of the substance in which the fibre lies imbedded, and found it to consist of gum, mucilaginous matter, and a peculiar kind of vegetable extract, containing a small quantity of tan. The substances were precipitated from their solutions by means of re-agents, when, after drying, the gum bore a greater resemblance to gum lac than to any other substance, and was perfectly soluble in solutions of potash, whether caustic or carbonated, and also capable of being dissolved in alcohol. The other parts, as mucilage and extractive matter, were soluble in water; hence, I conclude that potash is the cheapest solvent for cleansing flax, and that this can be best applied when it has been cleansed from the woody part and manufactured into cloth.

In the management of hemp and flax, I would recommend the following method, because it saves labor, and is more convenient to dress: When the plants are pulled, care should be taken to sort them, by putting the longest lengths by themselves, and, for the purpose of facilitating the handling of it at the machine, it is well to put about one pound of the plant into a bundle, as soon as the seed is thrashed, which is done with exceeding expedition by the machine. Let it be put to rot in water—the surface, after the plant is immersed, to be covered with boards or straw, or anything else, to exclude the sun's rays, which will cause the whole to have the same color. If troughs or vats are made use of (I would certainly recommend them where the farmer can possibly procure them) after the plant has been forty-eight hours in water, it should be drawn off, when the water will be found to be exceedingly discolored, and this should be repeated, after which, let the plant remain immersed until it be sufficiently rotted, which must, of course, be determined by experience and judgment.

The disagreeable smell, so much dreaded and deprecated, will, by this process, be greatly diminished. When the weather and the water were both warm in summer, I have known them to rot in seven days; in other instances, in cold weather, I have known them to lie buried for ninety days, without injury.

Extracts of a report made by "Peter Besnard, Esq., inspector general for Leinster, Munster, and Connaught, to the trustees of the Linen Board, London," by whom Mr. Besnard was appointed to proceed to Holland and the Netherlands, for the purpose of ascertaining the probable reasons why those countries are able to produce a flax of a softer and more silky quality than the flax of Ireland, &c., &c., 1822.

Taken from the American Farmer, vol. 5.

The process of flax-dressing is performed here, (Lokeran) and in France, on a hackle somewhat different from ours; it is nearly square, and the teeth not more than two inches and a half long, and although the work is well performed on it, it is not considered by some English flax-dressers as equal to an English hackle. Of Mr. ——— I particularly inquired if all the flax purchased by him gave seed, which he informed me it did even if intended for the finest purposes.

Proceeded from Brussels to Tournay, by Halle Enghein, Ath, and Leuse, in all of which towns the linen manufacture is carried on. On the whole line from Brussels to Tournay, excellent flax is grown, in considerable quantities; the greater part of it was pulled and set up to dry in a manner differing from the practice in Holland. In this country, and in France, flax, when put to dry, is not tied in bundles, but is placed loose, in a sloping direction, in long rows or ridges, the heads or boles to meet, and the root ends spread out so as to form a V reversed. At each end of the double rows of flax, and at certain intervals, stakes are driven into the ground to support them. This mode is decidedly preferable to bundles, because every part of the plant is equally presented to the influence of the air; but it should be observed, that it is suitable to a country where mild, calm weather prevails in the flax season.

In Cambray, I made inquiries relative to the article of cambric, peculiar to that town, or as it is here called, Batiste, from the name of the man who first introduced it, which, it is said, he was induced to do in consequence of the extreme softness of the water in the neighborhood. Here I was so fortunate as to see every process of this manufacture, from the preparation of the flax from the hackle to its finish for the consumer; and I was assured by many persons conversant with the business, that, except for some very superior kind of cambric, and very limited and inconsiderable scale, all flax used in the manufacture gives seed; for it is in the after management of the flax plant, the people of Cambray say, that everything depends to render it fit for fine works. So tenacious is the government of France of this seed, as well as of flax, that the export of both is prohibited. The process of steeping and cleaning flax, in this part of France, and in Flanders, from whence they get some supply, differs little from the plan followed in Holland—everything being done by hand; but the greatest care is observed in every stage of preparation for the hackle.

Here I feel it my duty to state, that, for regularity and method, in every operation, the plan pursued by the Dutch boors is to be preferred to any other. In all cases their mode of saving seed has decidedly the preference, in my estimation; and it may be necessary to add, and to impress on the minds of the flax cultivators in Ireland, who sow that plant, as an article of general commerce, that, without the seed, the Dutch boors would consider the business a very unprofitable one. It is generally computed, that, after all expenses of rippling, &c., the seed leaves at least from £8 to £9, the English acre; and one of the most convincing proofs that can be adduced in favor of the Dutch mode of cultivation of flax, is, that all the growers are independent, and many of them have, within a few years, risen from very humble beginnings to considerable wealth.

In the progress of my several tours through the countries that I have visited, I made it a particular point to examine, with care and attention, the soil in which flax is grown, and to ascertain (if possible) whether these places possessed any local advantages for the cultivation of that plant, which were not also possessed by the growers in Ireland. As far as my humble judgment serves, I could not observe, on this mission, nor call to mind, from the experience of many years, that the south of Ireland does not possess every requisite to admit of her growing flax of the same quality, and to the same profit, as is experienced in Holland; which, however, cannot be done without obtaining the seed, and presenting the article to market in that merchantable shape which must always ensure a demand and a renumerating price.

Why so general an opinion as has prevailed in Ireland, for a series of years, that flax which gives seed is not adapted for her fine linens, should have taken place, I cannot conjecture, nor is it here necessary for me to dwell on; but I can undertake to assert, without fear of contradiction, that I have seen on this tour, flax, the growth of Holland, Zealand, Brabant, Flanders, and France, that has given seed, fully equal in quality to what is grown in other countries, and applied to the manufacture of articles of as fine a texture as any made in Ireland. In a word, the growers of flax, in any of the countries I have named, would be considered as persons void of common understanding, did they not partake of every advantage and benefit which nature gives to the flax crop; or, in other terms, if they did not save the seed with the same care as is usually bestowed on every description of grain.

Soil.

The soil preferred by the cultivators of flax in the Netherlands is a deep, loamy clay, or what they term fat land, free from weeds, and capable of giving wheat, which is, in almost every case, the previous crop, except when land, after producing madder, is to be had, which is esteemed the best of all; but the cultivation of that plant being rather limited, it is rarely to be met in quantity compared with wheat stubble; it is, however, a general practice in that country never to sow flax but in rich, good ground.

Preparation of the soil.

The mode usually followed in the Netherlands of preparing ground for flax, if from wheat stubble, (the general previous crop) is, after reaping, to have it immediately lightly ploughed, and let to lie in fallow until the ensuing spring, when it is again lightly ploughed, preparatively to the sowing of the seed; but if grown after a madder crop, the custom is to give a light ploughing in spring, a little before sowing.

Sowing.

With respect to the seed sown in Holland and Zealand, it is invariably either Riga or home-saved, none other being used; the latter is sown for two, sometimes three seasons in succession, never longer; and, at the end of that time, Riga seed is again sown; but some of the rich and judicious flax boors every year sow a small parcel of Riga seed, so as to keep up a constant succession of fresh. When selecting seed for sowing, either of Riga or home-saved, the most scrupulous attention is paid to procure it of the best and cleanest kind.

As to the quantity sown in any given portion of ground, much depends on the quality of the soil and the age of the seed, which experience alone can determine; but, as well as I could collect information from the boors on this subject, comparing their measurement with the English and Irish acre, the quantity sown bears a due proportion to that of Riga seed, usually sown in England and Ireland. The time of sowing is generally between the end of March and middle of April.

Pulling.

In the Netherlands and France, flax is always allowed to arrive at maturity, and is never pulled, particularly in Holland and Zealand, until the seed is perfectly formed, and the capsule brown and hard, so as to be easily disengaged from the stalk; when in that state, it is pulled, and at once made into small sheaves, which are placed in stocks of eight to the stock, the root-ends on the ground, projecting, and the heads meeting at the top in such a manner as to present the entire of them to the influence of the air; in this way it remains eight, ten, and sometimes fourteen days, according to the state of the weather. Should occasional rain fall at this time, it is considered of great service, to wash off the impurities and withered leaves which attach to the plant when ripening.

Rippling.

When flax is sufficiently dried, it is taken to the barn, and the process of taking off the seed immediately commences. This operation, in the Netherlands, is chiefly done by ripples, or iron pins, about sixteen inches long, and one inch square at the bottom, gradually narrowing at the top, and forming into squares; the pins are fastened into a block of timber, above four inches thick, eighteen inches wide, and made in the form of an octagon, the upper part sloped off so as to let the boles run down to the floor; those pins are set at about a quarter of an inch asunder, thirty of them in each block, which is fastened, by means of two staples and wedges, to a two-inch plank, that rests on triple trees of a sufficient height for grown persons to sit on whilst rippling; two usually work at the same ripple, sitting opposite each other, and drawing the flax alternately through the teeth. During this process, great care is taken not to let it slip through the hands so as to entangle the root ends, which, in every process, are kept as even as possible. When the seed is discharged, the flax is again made into small sheaves, and in every instance bound together by plaited cords, three and a half feet long, made of strong rushes, that usually last for years, and are carefully put up from one season to another. When the entire quantity of flax prepared for rippling has undergone that operation, the boles are immediately run through a very coarse screen, sufficiently open to admit every particle of waste or dirt to pass through, so that they remain free of all impurities. The waste discharged in this manner is used by bakers in heating ovens, and the bole, by being thus cleaned, remains safe, and the seed can be kept for any time required. The mode most approved of for taking the seed from the bole is to thrash it, which is done by a flail, the handle of which is similar to a common one, but the working part is not more than half the usual length—about four inches diameter.

The hulls, after the seed is discharged, are sold, at the rate of two pence the sack, for feeding cattle in the winter. They are chiefly bought by Brabant farmers, who mix them with various other vegetables and carrots, which they grow with their flax, in ground suitable; and I have seen, in Brabant particularly, numerous fields, with flax standing to dry, and the peasantry weeding carrots that had grown with it, and which appeared in a prosperous state.

Steeping.

This process being the most important one which flax undergoes, and on which its value, in a great measure, depends, claimed my most serious attention, and occupied me for a considerable time in observing it in detail, as performed by various steepers, and with flax the growth of different places.

In general, the steeping pools in Holland are similar to what are known in Ireland as trenches of water, to drain and divide low grounds, such as abound in various parts of the south and west provinces, particularly where the soil is best suited to the growth of flax, and most like that of Holland and Zealand. Those trenches, in the summer months, are grown over with light grass and weeds, which are cut a little before steeping time, from the edges of the bank only, leaving the middle and the trench undisturbed. Previous to steeping, a sod or mud bank is thrown across each end of that portion of the trench required, which is seldom more than sixty to eighty yards.

In making those banks, the mud, for the distance of eleven or twelve feet from each, is drawn with iron scrapers from the middle and bottom of the trench, and sloped against each of them, leaving a space of water, free from weeds and mud, sufficient to put in a set of sheaves, and admit of a pool, eight or ten feet, between the cross bank and the last layer of flax. The steeping pool being thus prepared, a bundle of sheaves is opened, and eight of them laid in with small light forks, with which they are as regularly placed as if laid with a line, each sheaf being put down with the root-end towards the cross bank, and the top-end towards the bottom of the pool: when the first layer is down, a second and a third layer of eight sheaves is put in, the root-end of every layer meeting the bands of the former one, and all placed in an oblique direction. When three layers, or twenty-four sheaves, (which is always the number that is put in at a time) are laid, the steepers, who are provided with scrapers and forks, draw from the bottom of the trench, mud, slime, weeds, &c., &c., just as it comes to hand, and which they place, to the thickness of six or eight inches, on the flax, leaving only as much of the last layer uncovered as may be sufficient to receive the first layer of the next, and for which room is made by the removal of the mud, slime, &c., used as a covering for the former layer.

In laying on the mud, great care is taken to plaster it together, and so combine it as to exclude the air and light completely from the flax.* The entire quantity being thus placed in the pool, nothing appears but a surface of mud. The next operation is to throw, from that part of the trench not wanted, a sufficient quantity of water to cover the entire mass, to the depth of six or eight inches. Although the mode of throwing the water into the steeping pool is done by a simple contrivance, it is nevertheless worthy of observation—as it abridges labor and saves time—points duly appreciated by the working classes in land. This business is performed by means of a triangle, made of slight poles, placed across the trench, near one of the banks: from the centre of the triangle is suspended, by a slight cord, a chute, or oblong box, capable of containing about five or six gallons, and which lies at a small depth in the water; to the chute is attached a long handle, with which the steeper works it, and so throws the water into a cut, made in one corner of the cross bank, by which it is conveyed over the mud. When this is done, the flax remains from six to thirteen days, according to its quality and the temperature of the weather, and, in some cases, the properties of the water and mud: and I witnessed, myself, the taking out of flax, grown in Holland and Zealand, some of which had been steeped in seven days, whilst others required fourteen to prepare it. It is here necessary to observe, that the flax growers in the Netherlands carefully watch the flax during the steeping process, particularly after the fifth day, when they, once in every twenty-four hours, take out a sheaf with a fork, and examine it; if not sufficiently steeped, it is carefully replaced and covered. When the flax is found sufficiently steeped, it is drawn out with great care, by forks, beginning with the sheaves last laid in, one sheaf only being taken out at a time, which is turned over into the water, to disengage the mud from it, when it is gently washed in the pool, and left at the end of the cross bank for that purpose; after washing, it is laid in rows, by the side of the pool, to drain, from which it is spread on the grass, where it remains until the cultivator finds it ready for breaking. For this process there is no defined time, every farmer judging for himself when his flax should be raised; but it is the uniform practice, in those parts of France and the Netherlands where I have been, to grass all flax after steeping; no regard whatever is paid to the situation of the steeping pools as to aspect; those which I saw in various places lay in every direction, nor did it appear to me to be of any moment, in consequence of the total exclusion of the light and air, by the covering of mud, &c. When removing the flax from the field to the barn or store, it is again made into small sheaves, nearly of an equal size, twelve of which are bound together, similarly to what they were when going to be steeped.

Drying.

Should the flax, which has been raised from the ground, be found partially damp, which often happens in Holland, it is dried, or rather aired, on what is called a kiln, but which is merely a brick building in an open space, about twelve feet long, with a slight brick wall in the centre, and projecting walls at each end, about three and a half feet deep. The fire pit, which runs the whole length of the building, is from two to three feet under ground; the fuel used is always the shoves and other waste that drop in scutching, which is kept continually stirring, so as throw a regular and gentle heat to every part of the plant, which lies across strong rods, that rest on each end of the projecting walls. When the flax can be cleaned without this process, it is so done; but, when necessary, it is performed with the greatest care. Immediately after the flax is sufficiently aired, it is put into a small building, air-tight, where it remains until it cools.

Putting the flax into this building, after airing, is, I believe, what gave rise to the idea of its being stoved, in Holland, previous to cleaning; as I could not learn, in the course of my inquiries on that subject, that such a practice had ever existed.

Breaking and Scutching.

In the Netherlands, flax is always broken and scutched by hand machines—for the most part, with breakers and scutchers, similar to those known in many parts of England, where flax is much grown, and known, also, in some parts of Ireland. In one part of Flanders, a hand machine, similar to that described in page 6, is used; and it appears to be very applicable to those districts where flax is grown in small quantities, and does not arrive to that length and strength of staple produced in the rich grounds of many parts of Munster. In no instance, however, could I discover that any kind of machinery, worked by moving power, was ever used in Holland; but it is worthy of remark, that, throughout the Netherlands, the flax plant is so carefully attended to, in every operation, that it breaks and dresses with great facility and comparative ease, and presents a more finished and better article than is to be found in most other countries.

Whilst viewing the treatment of flax in the Netherlands, I was not a little surprised at seeing cattle of every kind grazing in the field where it was steeping, and with free access to the steeping pools, the water of which in Ireland is considered to be highly injurious to every animal. Having questioned a boor on this matter, he told me he never knew an instance of cattle being injured by flax water, nor is any precaution whatever used to keep them from it. On examining the water in which the flax is steeped, I found the color of it to differ much from that of the flax pools in Ireland; and I am led to think, on further consideration of the subject, that the vegetable matters which are blended with the mud, when spread over the flax, being decomposed into the fermentative process that takes place, mingle with the mucilage of the plant, and act as agents to neutralize its injurious qualities. How far this may be the case, or whether the plant, being ripe before watering, and totally excluded from light and air in this process, may produce effects different from those in Ireland, I shall not pretend to say; but the fact is as I have described it.

*Only one set of layers of sheaves in depth is put in each steeping pool at a time, it being found injurious to the flax to let the discharge of mucilage from one parcel blend with another. About one foot of water is in the pool when the flax is laid in.

That the mode practiced in Holland, Zealand, Flanders, and France, of excluding light and air in the steeping of flax, has a powerful effect on the color of the plant, cannot be doubted; and that the properties of the water and mud employed have considerable influence in that point, as well as on the texture of it, is equally certain, and is fully exemplified in each of those countries, as will be seen by the following statement:

In that part of Holland where flax, the growth of that country and of Zealand, is steeped, and where the soil is dark, and of a slimy nature, the water soft and clear, and perfectly suited for culinary and other domestic uses, it is found that it comes from the steeping pool of a dark clay color, varying only in shades, according to the quality of the soil, or mud, with which it is covered; but every parcel is uniformly of one color, from each pool; it is, likewise, of a soft and silky nature.

In Zealand, when flax is steeped, as in Holland, with respect to the exclusion of the air and light, it is always of an uniform color; but, from the quality of the water and soil, comes from the pool of a light straw color, and is harder in its nature than that steeped in Holland. This is attributed to the brackishness of the water and soil, which purges the plant in the steeping pools, and deprives it of its extractive matter; so much so, that it is calculated to lose, in steeping, in Zealand, from 20 to 25 per cent. more than when steeped in Holland For this reason, the Dutch flax boors bring the flax that they grow in Zealand from the field, dried with the boles on it, to be steeped, &c., at home, often fifty and sixty miles distant. When flax, in Zealand, is not steeped with the same care as in Holland, by excluding it from the air and light, with mud and slime, it comes from the pool precisely as it does in many parts of the south and west of Ireland, of various colors and qualities, even in one strick, or bunch, in consequence of which it sells, at all times, in the Rotterdam market, at an under price, for inferior work. This is a strong proof of the effects produced by the exclusion of light and air in the steeping process.

In Flanders, where the soil is lighter in quality and color, and the water clearer and fresher, than in Holland, the flax is some shades brighter than that steeped in Holland; but not of the straw color, or harsh description of that steeped in Zealand; it is, however, uniformly of one shade from every steeping pool, doubtless in consequence of the exclusion of light and air.

In France, where the soil is still lighter than in Flanders, the flax is of a lighter color than in that country or Holland, and is between a straw and clay color, neither so hard as the Zealand flax, nor so soft as that steeped in Holland; it is, however, like all the others, when excluded from the light and air, of one color from every pool; nor did I see, in the course of my examination of flax, in the several countries I visited, any of that article striped in color, or of different qualities, in one head, or strick, but that grown in a part of Zealand—where the cultivation may be said to be in its infancy, as compared to other places.

On the whole, it appears to me, from every information I have received, and from the best consideration I have given the subject, according to my humble judgment, that the exclusion of the light and air from the flax, in the steeping process, as practiced in the Netherlands and France, form the most important points in the treatment of that plant; and I am of opinion that a due attention to the mode practiced in these countries would eventually lead to the cultivation of flax, in Ireland, on a scale that would be of the utmost importance to the landlords, tenantry, and peasantry, of the country.

With respect to the regulations in those countries for dividing the flax into different sorts, or numbers, according to its fineness or coarseness, there is no law or public examination, as in Petersburg and Riga—nor does there seem to be the smallest necessity for such a measure; the flax growers themselves, being sensible of the advantages derived from a regular system, carefully assort each quality before they offer it for sale, and set a price on it accordingly. On this point, the merchants are equally particular; as they separate, with great care, every quality they purchase. In making up for a foreign market, there is no rule as to the size of the bundle, or pack, the merchant being governed by the orders of his correspondents, who, for the most part, differ in respect to the size of them, some directing them to be made up in bales of one cwt., while others order them in bales of four and six cwt.

On a recent examination, by Mr. Bander, of Kew, of the material which covers the Egyptian mummies, it is found to be made from flax, some of it plain linen, and some of it from twisted yarn, similar to sewing thread, varying in the quality of the texture, according, (as it is supposed) to the rank of the deceased. In making this discovery, Mr. Bander ascertained that the fibres of the flax plant are cylindrical tubes, the surface presenting a spiral appearance.

The fact of the fibre of the flax being a tube, appears to me to elucidate, most clearly, the cause of the slowness in the fermentive process of the finer plants, compared with the coarser, (2) being an equal portion in circumference of the fine, contains a greater number of fibres or cylinders, of more minute dimensions, than the coarse, and do not, therefore, discharge the air and mucilege (3) so rapidly as the latter, which is composed of considerable quantities of wood, and less fibre than the fine; it likewise demonstrates the necessity for depriving the plant, before steeping, of the bole or capsule, which may be said to act as a stopper to the fibres or cylinders, and actually seals them at the tops, thereby preventing the necessary discharge until the bole separates from the plant, which it always does with great uncertainty; thus occasioning portions of it to be over-steeped, and other parts not sufficiently done, which causes the variety of colors, and inequality of texture, so often found in Irish flax.

In Russia, and in every other part of the continent, flax is deprived of the bole before steeping, and it is a fact well known, that flax grown in Ireland, generally speaking, is the most irregularly prepared for market of any in Europe, though the soil of the country is at least equally fertile, and the climate as congenial as that of Holland, or the provinces on the shores of the Baltic.

The mellowness and evenness of every description of continental linen, so well known and admired by those acquainted with that manufacture, is considered to arise from the superior quality of the flax of which it is composed—in the preparation of which the greatest pains are taken. Viewing, therefore, the treatment of this valuable plant in the Netherlands, in all its bearings, it seems to me that the greater art (if such it may be called) of producing it of a better quality, and in a more merchantable form, than it is done in Ireland, rest solely on a well regulated system, from which no person deviates, from the sower of the seed to the export merchant.

Note 1. In speaking of the qualities of the soil in Holland, Flanders, and France, I allude to those places only where I have seen flax cultivated.

Note 2. It is well known to those conversant with the treatment of flax in Ireland, that the fine plant requires more time to steep than the coarse. It is also known that the top ends are not so well steeped as the other parts. Allowing the capsule to remain on the plant in the steeping process, seems to account for the latter defect.

Note 3. The mucilage, or, more properly speaking, the resin of the flax, is a permanent dye, from which a variety of shades of color has been obtained.

Extract of a letter from Mr. ———, of France, to Peter Besnard, Esq., dated —

London, August 23, 1822.

In answer to your question respecting the causes of the different appearances of Irish and Dutch flax, I have endeavored to give you, as follows, the best solution in my power.

The Irish mode of steeping flax, compared with that used in Holland, is defective in principle, and injurious in the result, to those qualities essential to constitute a good article.

When flax is steeped in a green state, whilst the plant has not yet attained maturity, it is plain that all the fibre of which it was susceptible is not formed; and its constituent principles, being but imperfectly combined, are the easier separated. This occasions substantial loss. The carbon which should go to form the fibre, is, by the process of fermentation, sent off in the shape of carbonic acid gas, which, rising to the surface of the water, escapes, and forms that deleterious atmosphere, so fatal to animal existence. Again, the flax being exposed to the influence of the light, becomes variegated, and the decomposition is so rapid and tumultuous, that not only much of the tender plant is destroyed, but the volatile products fly off, and, meeting no resistance, mix with the air, forming a mixture of sulphurated and ammoniated hydrogen, which is but too evident to the olfactory senses of those who come within the sphere of the nauseous and noxious effluvia. The defence set up in favor of this mode, namely, that the younger the plant the finer the tissue, even if true, I doubt would compensate for the actual waste occasioned.

In Holland, the flax is not put to steep until at perfect maturity, and, even then, it is covered over in the steep with a thick layer of earth and mud, which, while it defends the flax from the action of light, furnishes certain affinities, which do not fail to take up and form, with the substance thrown off by the fermentation, insoluble compounds, such as earthy carbonates, sulphates, &c., and thus it is that the tissue suffers less, and maintains its uniform quality and color.

No. 1.

Extract of a letter from manufacturers in New York, dated —

July 29, 1824.

We have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 20th, desiring information respecting the cultivation and manufacture of hemp in the United States; and it affords us much pleasure to comply with your request, as far as our own experience and knowledge of the subjects, together with the hints derived from other respectable sources, may enable us.

A considerable portion of the lands in the States of Kentucky, Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana, is well adapted to the profitable culture of hemp. It may also be grown to advantage in several of the counties of the State of New York, and on the borders of the Connecticut river; or, indeed, in any of the middle and eastern States, where the soil is composed of a rich loam, or on alluvial bottoms.

Kentucky is the only State where it is at present raised in any considerable quantity, and the crop of last year, in that last State alone, was probably from 500 to 1,000 tons, which is manufactured chiefly into cotton bagging and the coarser kind of ropes, such as bale rope, &c.

With respect to the extent to which it may be cultivated, we have no hesitation in expressing our belief that Kentucky alone can furnish a sufficient supply for the consumption of the United States.

Hemp being an exhausting crop, it is said that the best of land will not advantageously bear a succession of more than three crops; but, in Kentucky, it has been ascertained by experience that the land, by being afterwards put into grass, especially clover, will, in three years, be restored to its ability to produce a further succession of three crops of hemp.

The quantity obtained from an acre, by the ordinary process of rotting and preparing the hemp, is from 500 to 800 pounds; but when cleaned in an unrotted state, it is supposed that the yield will be from one-half to two-thirds more. The perfection to which machinery for cleaning hemp, both in a rotted and unrotted state, is now brought, warrants the conclusion that, in a short time, it will be in general use.

The ordinary mode of sowing the seed is considered to be defective, from the small quantity put into the ground. At present, a bushel and a quarter is the usual quantity, which produces too rank a growth, and, of course, the fibre is coarse and harsh. It is said by judicious farmers that, upon rich soil, two bushels of seed, at least, ought to be used to the acre.

The hemp of this country, before rotting, is fully equal to any hemp of foreign growth; the texture of the fibre, generally, resembling that of the St. Petersburg and Archangel, and the finest kinds being fully equal to the best Riga.

The price of St. Petersburg clean hemp here, at the present, is $170 per ton. [The average price for this kind may be taken at $180 to $200 per ton.] Riga is worth $10 to $20 more; while American (solely from the imperfect manner of rotting it) sells now for about $110 per ton.

Our hemp is almost invariably what is termed dew-rotted, and experience has satisfactorily shown that cordage made of hemp of this description, is by no means so durable as that made of water-rotted hemp; and the foreign hemps, above mentioned, are all water-rotted. Dew-rotted hemp does not retain the tar necessary to the protection of the cordage from the effects of the wet, and without tar it is injuriously affected by the water, in a much greater degree than water-rotted hemp.

In order to make our hemp equal to any of foreign growth, and to supply its place altogether, as far as quality is concerned, nothing further is necessary than that it be water-rotted, or prepared without rotting, if, upon proper investigation, it be found that the machines which have been constructed for the purpose will make the hemp suitable for all kinds of cordage.

We have long and anxiously looked forward to an improvement in the culture and preparation of the hemp of our own country, and inquiries which we have diligently made have resulted in the conviction that the expense and difficulties of water-rotting hemp have been much overrated with us. It was tried upon a small scale, in Orange county, in this State, the last year, in wooden tanks, and the experiment resulted very satisfactorily.

The usual mode of water-rotting hemp is to steep the plants in pools of standing water, or in clear and running water. The length of time required for steeping is various, and a complete knowledge of it can only be attained by practice; much will, of course, depend upon the temperature of the water. In some cases, ten to eleven days may be necessary, whereas, in others, four, five, or six, will be sufficient. The slenderest hemp is said to require the most soaking, and the operation is known to be finished by the heart separating easily from the reed or woody part. The bundles should be laid in the water crosswise upon each other, taking particular notice of the manner in which they lie when put in, in order that they may be taken out without difficulty.

Fine and soft fibred hemp is the best: ours is too frequently the reverse, owing to the seed being too sparingly sown. The strongest and richest land will, of course, yield the most abundant crop; but that which is poorer will produce the finest and softest hemp. Hemp which has stood for seed is not considered equal to that which is pulled before it is ripe; consequently, it would seem proper to set apart a piece of ground upon which to ripen seed for a subsequent season, and the seed thus raised will be better than that raised in the common way.

The foreign hemp received here is not generally of as good quality as is produced in the places where it is grown. It is frequently old hemp, having in part lost its strength. It is, moreover, all more or less injured on the voyage, by being heated in the hold of the vessel, and in many instances very materially so, even in cargoes which are here deemed merchantable. If we would require any additional inducement to encourage the cultivation and proper management of the hemp of our own soil, so as to avoid a dependence upon foreign countries for this indispensable requisite in the equipment of our ships, both national and of private character, it may be found in the fact that the supply of foreign hemp, at all times precarious, has, on some occasions, been sadly deficient.

We have been furnished, lately, through the instrumentality of the Commissioners of the Navy, with a small quantity of water-rotted hemp, grown on Connecticut river; we have also obtained a similar quantity of hemp, raised in Kentucky, prepared and dressed by machinery, without watering or exposure to dew. Both these hemps look extremely well, and we have no doubt will make strong cordage. It is our intention to have some of each parcel spun and prepared for cordage, in precisely the same manner, to be made into ropes of the same size and weight, as near as may be, and then to test their comparative and respective strength with a rope of the best Russia hemp, of similar size and similarly made in every respect. The result, with any remarks which may be deemed pertinent, shall be communicated to you as soon as the experiment shall have been made, which, we trust, will be in about a fortnight.

We consider that the foregoing remarks upon the quality of hemp are equally applicable, whether it be converted into cloth, twine, or cordage. Hitherto cordage has constituted the almost entire consumption of hemp. A considerable quantity, we conceive, will now be wrought into cotton bagging.

Extract of a letter from a manufacturer of canvas, at Paterson, New Jersey, to the Hon. Secretary of the Navy, dated —

August 9, 1824.

I should have before replied to the letter which you did me the honor to address to me, under date of the 31st ultimo, but being in a great measure unacquainted with the subject on which you required information, I have been since engaged in procuring as much as opportunity afforded me, and I have now the honor to communicate the result of my inquiries. I would here, however, observe, that, previous to the receipt of your letter, I had the honor to receive one from the president of the Board of Navy Commissioners, on the subject of the growth and manufacture of flax, which, having answered, if it were necessary to your purpose, I could, and would, with pleasure, furnish a copy.

It appears, from all I can learn, that hemp may be produced in any soil; in Russia it is indigenous, found in all the south and middle parts, and even on the Uralian mountains, though the general opinion seems to be that the greater crops are produced from that which is a deep black mould, formed from the decomposition of vegetable matter; until the texture is apparent, its situation should be low, with some small degree of moisture. This description of soil will produce hemp in greater abundance than any other, and every State in the Union possesses more or less thereof: this State, in particular, has a full share, together with the convenience of market for the sale, and a plentifulness of that description of manure which would best answer to restore the land to its former state.

The land is prepared, by some, with three, by others with four ploughings, after it is manured; immediately after one crop is removed, 'tis usual in England to plough and harrow; the same thing is again gone through with early in the spring, and afterwards, just before the seed is sown; this makes its condition perfectly mellow, and renders it free from all kinds of weeds; in our country, if the ground be broken twice with the plough, and once harrowed, it seems to be considered sufficient; and in Russia, less pains still is taken, besides being more imperfectly done.

The seed for hemp, as for flax, should be weighty, and of a bright color; good soils will admit of three bushels to the acre; not less than two should be used where one and a half bushels are now put in, as the hemp, the thicker it is sown, provided it is not overdone, will be finer in its fibre, and, consequently, spins a finer yarn, and lays much closer, besides that the twist will be more easily accomplished by the working hand or the machine, and it will be a much stronger yarn made from fine hemp than coarse, both being of the same diameter. The seed is sown in a broadcast manner, as early as the climate will admit, and covered in with the harrow. Drilling is sometimes resorted to in England, under the impression that the early growth of the plant is promoted; but the broadcast is preferred. The seed may be put in in April, the frosts being over even earlier, as the plants are more vigorous, and less affected by the different subsequent operations they have to undergo.

There are few soils in this country that could not produce, or be made to produce, hemp; and repeated crops may be obtained, as advantageously to the ground, from the same piece of land, with proper attention, and as little exhaustion, as almost any other vegetable production. It is asserted that, in Suffolk, in England, it has been grown for seventy years in succession, on the same spot of ground, and, by continually manuring, the ground would be restored, and it might be grown forever.

After it is sown, the management of the crop is attended with very little trouble; when it is properly ripe, it is pulled up by the roots, the mould well shaken off, and laid up in what are called baits. If the hemp be intended for a seed crop, it should be perfectly ripe; but if for manufacturers' use, it should be pulled earlier, as the coloring matter is then more easily extracted, and the hemp has less tow, besides that it is generally believed the fibre is stronger. The next process which the plants undergo is termed rotting—one method is denominated dew, the other water-rotting; and it is admitted on all sides that the latter is to be greatly preferred. It affords much the finest, strongest, and longest staple hemp. The former process, however, is practiced in our country almost universally; in fact, except on Connecticut river, I have heard of no other place where the method is pursued; and there, water-rotting is but imperfectly managed both as to economy and usefulness. To dew-rot the hemp, the stalks, immediately after they are pulled, are spread on the ground, as thinly as possible, where they are left three or four weeks, occasionally turned; and, in this situation, they are subject to all the variableness of our climate, which is so fluctuating and uncertain that hemp is materially injured before the farmer is aware of it, or could conveniently prevent it; the fibre is then generally weakened by being burnt up with the sun, or from too long exposure and excessive wet. Even in England, where the climate is much more favorable for this process, the greatest care and attention will scarcely prevent injury; and it is never resorted to when the hemp is the object, as it is not uncommon to find, on examination, that the hemp is deteriorated in quality from too long exposure; in addition, also, the risk of damage. This is the most troublesome and longest process; for, in water-rotting, the hemp is never handled, after it is put into the water, until the process is completed; it is then taken out, tied into rather small bundles, placed upright between two ropes, extended (parallel to each other) across a lot, and from this position it is protected from the effects of the rain, as also it is exposed to dry much sooner. The hemp, after it is pulled, is carried to a deep pond, or wooden tank of standing water; it is placed thereon, bundle upon bundle, cross-wise, and when the pond is filled, the whole should be completely immersed in the water by loading it with heavy pieces of timber; in four or five days, the process being finished, it is taken out and dried as soon as possible, in the manner explained before. Another method of rotting has been suggested in France, and practiced successfully: the water is heated to a temperature of 72 to 75 degrees of Reaumer, dissolving in it a quantity of green soap, in the proportion of one to forty-eight of hemp; the quantity of water composed with the hemp should be as one to forty; the hemp is thrown in, and the vessel covered over, and in two or three hours, it appears, the hemp is fully steeped. If this process should be found to answer, it is by far the most convenient of any yet known, unless the application of steam prove as effectual, or more so, without the addition of soap.

After the hemp is rotted, it is to be broken. A coarse and fine break is sometimes used in England, but the rollers of the lint mill are preferred, because of its being more expeditiously performed. In our country, they use what is called a hemp-mill; which is a large, heavy stone, formed like a sugar loaf, with the small end cut off—such a form as is generally used for grinding white lead; a shaft is run through it, and it is made to revolve in a circle; when passing on a plane, the hemp becomes crushed and broken by the stone, and is subsequently swingled. The rollers of the lint-mill are, however, thought to be better; and my own opinion is, that Mr. S. Swartwout's machine for breaking flax would answer better than any other mode which is now practiced.

The average crop, per acre, in America, England, and Russia, has been estimated as follows: America 400 lbs.; England, 650 lbs.; Russia, 500 lbs. The present price of American dew-rotted, is $115 per ton, that of Russia $170 per ton.

The cultivation of this plant would, no doubt, be of great national benefit—not, perhaps, arising immediately from the production of hemp, but the absolute necessity, almost, of being independent of this article from foreign countries in time of war, and the great value it is susceptible of attaining from the manufacture in our country. There is, perhaps, except in England, a greater quantity of hemp consumed than in any other, in the manufacture of cordage, sail-cloth, cotton bagging, and in numerous qualities of ordinary cloths. The certainty of a market would, no doubt, very much tend to increase the cultivation; and a demand might be created by protecting the manufacturer to such an extent as to admit of his paying the farmer such a price for the raw material as would bring the gain and demand for the article to a par with any advantage he might obtain from any other article of vegetable production. The hemp manufactured into cordage is generally brought from abroad. I have written to a manufacturer on the subject, and when I obtain the information I have solicited and expect, it will be transmitted to you. In my mill I have spun, for cloth only, about two tons. Not having been properly prepared, I discontinued the use of it; however, the machinery I possess will spin hemp as well as flax, and hereafter I may be induced to turn my attention to it again. As far as I can learn, I am the only person in the United States that will attempt to spin by machinery—I mean fine threads, capable of making duck.

To prepare the hemp for spinning, it is hackled on three tools, to reduce it to the same fineness with flax, which is reduced on two tools, and in the process we make use of oil to supply that elasticity which naturally it does not possess. All subsequent processes are the same as flax, the machinery being only altered in the draft from roller to roller, to conform to the length of the staple; it is also susceptible of being altered, that it may be made to spin the shortest tow, and longest hemp.

I would, as it regards my own interest, prefer to make use of the American hemp, were it as good as the foreign, or could I substitute it for the same purpose; but, as the reputation of a manufacturer depends on the quality of his goods, it is absolutely necessary the raw material should be of the best quality; and it is a fact, that neither the flax nor hemp of this country are of such a quality as to justify their general use for manufacturing purposes.

Extract of a letter from a manufacturer, dated —

SEPTEMBER 25, 1824.

The cultivation of hemp I am not acquainted with; one important defect in the American hemp is in the preparation for dressing it, in the dew-rotted instead of water-rotted state, as in Russia. There is in hemp an oily substance, which the dew-rot destroys and the water-rot preserves; this oil may be considered as the life of the hemp. Water-rotted hemp has a bright, silky appearance; dew-rotted has a dark, husky appearance; dew-rotted will not stand the water when manufactured, and will not answer for cables or standing rigging. I have manufactured, in the last six years, nearly three thousand tons of cordage, and during that time there has not been twenty tons of American hemp in the market; the quality, when compared with that from Russia, is so inferior, that our ship owners will not purchase the cordage; and I must again repeat, that the principal cause of this defect is in the manner of rotting it, and why the mode of dew-rotting is practiced I cannot say. There have been two lots of American hemp sold recently in New York, of twenty tons each; one parcel brought one hundred dollars per ton, and the other one hundred and thirty dollars per ton; the reason why this difference, one lot was not properly dressed, which is the case of much of the Kentucky hemp. Russia hemp, at the same time, sold at from one hundred and sixty-five to one hundred and seventy dollars per ton.

Extract of a letter from a manufacturer of hemp, at Norfolk, Va., dated —

OCTOBER 30, 1824.

I have given to the inquiries you have done me the honor to make, on the subject of the cultivation and manufacture of hemp, all the consideration my desire to comply with your wishes would suggest, and now beg leave, with diffidence, to submit the result. Being engaged in the manufacture of cordage for twenty-five years, the article of hemp has been of primary importance. For several years we used Virginia hemp chiefly; believing it to be of good staple, and only requiring pains in preparing it, we took a good deal of trouble in urging the growers of it to be particular in curing and cleaning it. In the years 1809 and '10, Russia hemp being scarce and very high, we urged on Messrs. Caruthers, of Lexington, Virginia, (large dealers in the article) and living in the neighborhood of the best hemp country, the advantage and necessity of improving it, and contracted to give them $290 per ton for 70 to 80 tons, to be clear and well prepared. Mr. W. Caruthers paid particular and personal attention to it, and it proved (with some exception) of excellent quality. This was all grown in Rockbridge, Botetourt, and Montgomery counties, on the James, Jackson, and Cowpasture rivers, and this has hitherto been the part of the State where it was grown to any extent, the three counties then producing 50 to 100 tons each, annually. Knowing that the practice of preparing it was by dew, or air-rotting, (which is very tedious, it lying out for months, exposed to all the vicissitudes of weather, and is often thereby injured in strength, always in color,) in the year 1810, Mr. Theo. Armistead, who was Navy agent here, and also had a rope walk, and who was very zealous in the improvement of country hemp, with our establishment, held out strong inducements to have the hemp water-rotted, in place of the usual mode; but so difficult is it to change old habits, that only in one instance did we succeed. Col. Wilson C. Nicholas, of Albemarle county, and formerly Governor of Virginia, water-rotted his crop, and, to encourage and extend this mode, we gave, for the part of it we got, (a few tons) $360 per ton; the quality was excellent, color much improved, and, we believe, the fibre, also, in strength and fineness, though it was not so well cleaned or prepared as it might have been. The experiment seemed satisfactory that it was capable of improvement, by proper management.

The practice in all hemp countries, (Russia the principal) is, uniformerly, to water-rot, which operation is performed in the short space of four to ten days, according to weather, and whether in standing or running water; this process, we have reason to believe, requires very particular attention, as it regards both quality and quantity of the article. In 1809 and '10 we had hemp and yarns again from Winchester, Kentucky, the staple and quality very good, and well handled; we then thought it only required to be water, instead of dew-rotted, to be equal to any we had seen. We have since had occasional supplies of Virginia and Kentucky, and though it has deteriorated, from neglect and mismanagement, we still think the staple good, and, if carefully water-rotted, and cleaned by batling, scutching and hackling, I cannot see any reason why it should not be as well suited for cordage and sail-cloth as any imported; it is, at least, of so much importance as to be worth a fair experiment. Much will depend on the cultivation of it; it will be their province to make experiments in the soil best adapted to its growth, cutting at proper time, curing, and cleaning. If they do their duty, I am of opinion that many of the existing objections to American hemp may be removed. Many parts of the western country, I am told, are well adapted to its growth; and, I believe, a great part of the lands in North Carolina and Virginia, watered by the Roanoke, would yield it to great advantage. It may be proper here to remark, the cause of hemp having been so high in 1809 and '10 was, that very little was imported; that from Russia sold at $400 to $450 per ton; but, in the year following, the importation was so large that it fell to $200; since then, the cultivation of American hemp has annually lessened. For the last eight or nine years, we have used Russia hemp almost exclusively—proportion about $\frac{7}{8}$ and $\frac{1}{3}$. It is preferred by the manufacturer, because it is clean, easily worked, with but little loss, and is of good color. Seafaring people give Russia hemp a decided preference; they say it looks much better, wears better, and some are of opinion that American hemp is not well suited for water rope, as cables, &c.; and also say that the constant friction of the water washes the tar from it, and that it soon decays. I believe, however, that most of these objections are more matters of received opinion than from well tested experiments. I find that Russia hemp is much better some seasons than others; this, I judge, is owing to the seasons, as all vegetable growth is subject to them. The mode in Russia, of classing the hemp into three or four qualities, gives it character; when you buy of each, you know what you have. I have manufactured some parcels of Italian hemp, (Ancona) and found it to be of excellent quality, strong staple, and good color—indeed, the longest and strongest I had ever seen, though by no means so well prepared as the Russian, and, consequently, not so easily worked; it is doubted by some whether it is as well suited for tarred rope, and though we have, and are making some experiments on it, they are not yet satisfactorily proved. It makes excellent white rope. Manilla hemp, or grass, (I have used some parcels of it) is very strong and wiry, and said to be well suited for some smaller purposes, untarred; costs about 50 per cent. higher than the Russian. American hemp is generally about three-fourths the price of Russian and Ancona. Deeming the cultivation of hemp of great national importance, both for cordage and sail-cloth, too much pains cannot be taken to have its quality well ascertained; tending to which, if the legislatures of the States where it is cultivated would establish inspections, and have persons appointed competent to its duties, I am of opinion it would greatly advance its character; and, as another, and perhaps more immediate mode of ascertaining its qualities, I would beg leave, with great deference, to suggest that the Navy Department should offer a premium for a quantity, not less that fifty tons, to be water-rotted, carefully culled, and well cleaned by batling, scutching, and hackling, to be sent to a given place, and from thence distributed in suitable proportions to the principal naval stations, to be there manufactured, and judged of by the mechanic, and the commandant and officers of the station.

Memorandum of experiment made by a manufacturer of hemp.

Two ropes, each 2¼ inches in circumference, one made of hemp grown on Connecticut river, and water-rotted, broke with..... 3,209 lbs.
The other, made of clean St. Petersburg hemp, broke with..... 3,118 lbs.
Another rope, made of Kentucky unrotted hemp, broke with..... 2,968 lbs.

This last was 2¼ inches also; but it must be observed, that a considerable part of the hemp was damaged very materially in the transportation, and, it is highly probable that the whole of it had suffered some loss of strength.

Thirty yarns in each rope.

18TH CONGRESS.] No. 266. [2D SESSION.

OPINION OF THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY AS TO ALTERATIONS IN THE ORGANIZATION OF THE NAVY, WITH STATEMENTS OF TRAVELING AND OTHER ALLOWANCES TO OFFICERS OF THE NAVY AND MARINE CORPS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE JANUARY 10, 1825.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, January 1, 1825.

To the President of the Senate of the United States:

SIR: In obedience to the resolution of the Senate of the 25th of May last, I have the honor to present the following report:

The paper marked A, is a report made by the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, which shows "the amount of traveling expenses and other allowances, received by the officers of the navy and of the marine corps, over the monthly pay and rations to which they are, by law, entitled, in each year, for the last three years."

This amount embraces all the payments (except monthly pay and rations) made to officers within the time mentioned, whether the services, for which the payments were made, were rendered within that period, or previous to it. Our naval officers are frequently out of the country two or three years at a time, and, when in it, are sometimes so situated as to prevent them, without neglect of duty, from presenting their claims for adjustment with punctuality, and at definite periods.

Each settlement of their accounts, therefore, embraces not only their claims for the preceding year, but for the whole period since their last settlement; and, in giving an answer to this part of the resolution, it was found impossible to separate the one from the other, without an examination of every voucher, and restatement of every item of the accounts: a labor which could not be performed since the resolution was passed, and which was supposed not to be called for by it. This amount, therefore, will be understood to embrace all the claims and accounts settled and allowed within the last three years, preceding the first day of January last.

For the sums paid to each officer, and the objects for which they were paid, a general reference may be had to the reports annually made on the contingent expenses of the navy. There are about fifty officers in the marine corps, and nearly nine hundred in the navy. The amount stated contains the accounts of, and allowances to, almost all of this number.

None of the allowances are designed, nor do they operate, as additional pay to the officer for his time and services in his station; for these, the monthly pay and rations are the compensation prescribed by law; but they are intended to meet the expenses to which he is exposed, and the liabilities to which he is subjected in discharging the duties assigned him, and without which it would often be impossible to obey the orders he receives. This will be hereafter illustrated by some of the items in the accounts.

The average amount of traveling expenses, in each of the three years, paid to all the officers in the navy, appears to be $19,541, and to all the officers of the marine corps, appears to be $6,639. The principle by which this allowance is made is settled and uniform.

When any officer travels under the orders of the Department, or of his superior, on the business of the public, and not for his own convenience, he is allowed fifteen cents per mile.

This is never paid when engaged in private transactions, or changing his duties at his own request, and not for the benefit of the public. The sum allowed is the same for officers of all grades: is supposed to be about the average expense of traveling in this country; and is absolutely necessary to enable our officers to obey the orders given to them. They are appointed from all parts of the Union, and often obliged to travel great distances to join stations or vessels.

Such must always be the case with those from the western States. The duties to be performed, also, frequently require them to be transferred from one place to another. The expense of their journeys often equals the greater part, in some instances the whole, of their pay; and if they must themselves bear it, only those upon our seaboard, and the rich, who are able and willing to labor without compensation, can belong to the service.

It is both just to the individual, and beneficial to the public, that the allowance be made. For its safe and faithful expenditure, reliance must, in this case, as in others, be had, in the first instance, on the intelligence and integrity of those who give the orders, and, in the second, of those who settle the accounts; both of whom must pass upon them. The amount of $272,633.93, embraces all the sums paid to officers, exclusive of monthly pay and rations, traveling expenses, and expenses incident to courts-martial. It includes a great variety of items, and among others, the following: premiums and expenses for recruiting; chamber money and house rent; fuel and candles; commissions and clerk hire; store and office rent of navy agents and storekeepers; postage upon letters on public business; toll; sick quarters; purveying and care of medical stores; extra service in surveying, &c., &c. In every system of well organized public force, in all countries, most of these items form a part of the fundamental law creating it, and do not assume the character of allowances by Executive regulation, but enter into the general estimates for its support. It is the misfortune of the navy of the United States never to have received any organization by law, nor to have been favored by the legislature with a system into which they could be engrafted. They have, therefore, been left to temporary expedient and regulation, created from time to time as a necessity for them was felt. Under such circumstances, regularity and economy have been sought, and, as far as possible, effected. A few remarks on two or three of the items will explain their character and necessity.

Expense of recruiting.

A considerable portion of the amount is formed by this item. Rendezvous for recruiting must, from the nature of that business, be opened in those thickly settled parts of our cities, to which sailors are in the habit of resorting; and accommodations must be procured for the purpose. Officers of prudence and skill must be appointed to superintend them, and made responsible for the manner in which they discharge the duty and expend the money; and if they are imposed on as to the health or capacity of the recruit, or negligently permit him to desert, they must be subjected to loss. The annexed paper B, is a copy of regulations lately prepared to be added to and explain those previously existing on the subject, and will exhibit a part of the duty and liability of the recruiting officer, and, as the public afford him no accommodations of any description, his actual expenses are also great. Under these circumstances, and to urge on the enlistment, the commanding officer of the rendezvous has, heretofore, been allowed $4 for each recruit, and the inferior officer $1.50 per day, to pay his board and expenses. The bill reported at the last session proposes to reduce the allowance from $4 to $3.

Chamber money and house rent

Are allowed when an officer is ordered to perform a duty confining him to a particular place, and there is no vessel or building where he can eat or lodge—as when attached to and performing duty in a navy yard, or preparing his vessel for sea, and it is not in a situation for him to live on board, nor is there any other vessel or house, belonging to the public, for his accommodation. Compelled to obtain lodging and board, and often at very extravagant prices, his pay would be consumed by them, and, therefore, he is allowed either chamber money, at two dollars per week, if his duty be temporary, or house rent, at its usual rate at the place, if the duty be permanent. This expense, which is not small, will be, in a great degree, if not entirely avoided, when the necessary improvements are made in our yards.

Commissions on disbursements of public money.

It sometimes happens in the changes which occur upon our distant stations, by deaths and otherwise, and the necessities to which our squadrons are subjected, that our naval officers, whose general duty and office are altogether unconnected with the moneyed concerns of the Department, are obliged to negotiate and disburse money for the use of the officers, men and vessels under their command, in doing which they are liable to risks and losses. In such cases, upon the settlement of their accounts, a small per centage has been allowed on the moneys so negotiated and disbursed.

House rent, store rent, postage, fuel, clerk hire, stationery, &c., to navy agents and storekeepers.

It is doubted whether these items come strictly within the call made by the resolution; but, as the agents and storekeepers were officers attached to the Navy Department, and as these allowances are not the monthly pay and rations fixed by law, it was thought proper to add them. They are regulated by settled rules, and tend largely to swell the amount.

Per diem allowance on extra duty, such as surveying public property, proving cannon, surveying the coasts, harbors, &c.

This allowance is designed merely to meet the extra expense to which the officer is subjected; and the greater part of that which has arisen from the survey of the coast, &c., has been provided for by, and paid out of, the appropriations made by several laws passed upon the subject, and has not been taken from the appropriations for the navy; but, as the sums received by the officers were an allowance over the monthly pay and rations, it was necessary to add them to the others.

Purveying and care of medicines.

To ensure the economical purchase, safe keeping and proper disposition of medicines and medical stores, both for our ships and navy yards, it has been found necessary not to entrust the duty to each of the surgeons and mates attached to them, but from time to time to assign it to old and experienced surgeons, in addition to their ordinary duties, and to make a reasonable allowance for it. It is not doubted, however, that it may be performed more usefully and economically under the provisions of the bill reported at the last session.

There are other items, but it is not believed to be necessary to make any remark respecting them. They are all designed, not as additional pay to the officer, but to meet the extra expense and liability imposed on him, in obeying the orders which he receives, and without which he could not obey them, nor could the service be supported; are governed by fixed rules; and have most of them existed from the commencement of the navy, and had been confirmed and authorized by the annual appropriations. Some of them, it has been proposed by the Department, should be incorporated into permanent legal provisions, organizing the naval establishment.

This Department is not informed of any "emoluments received by the officers of the navy and marine corps, from the government, in consequence of their official stations," unless the allowance heretofore mentioned may be considered in that light. Nor is it perceived that they can, in any way, derive "emoluments from other sources," unless by means of the premium or compensation allowed to them by individuals for whom they carry silver, gold or jewels. Any other use of their official character, for private emolument, would be criminal, and, if known, subject them to punishment. It is not believed that an imputation of this offence can properly attach to them. By the 23d article of the "act for the better government of the navy of the United States," it is provided that "if any commander, or other officer, shall receive, or permit to be received, on board his vessel, any goods or merchandise, other than for the sole use of his vessel, except gold, silver, or jewels, and except the goods or merchandise of vessels that may be in distress, or shipwrecked, or in imminent danger of being shipwrecked, in order to preserve them for their owner, without orders from the President of the United States, or the Navy Department, he shall, on conviction thereof, be cashiered, and be incapacitated, forever afterwards, for any place or office in the navy." Under the authority of this provision, no emoluments could be derived from carrying anything but the excepted articles; these have always been carried when offered, and it could be done consistently with the faithful discharge of the duties in which the officer was engaged. His risk and responsibility, in the benefit he renders to the owner by carrying his property, is often great, and requires a corresponding compensation. This compensation is regulated in England by orders in council, authorized by statute. No law has yet been passed upon the subject in this country, and the Executive has not believed, since the passage of the law referred to, that it possessed the power, either to forbid the carrying of specie altogether, or to fix the compensation for doing it; but merely to see that the officer, while exercising his legal privilege, did not abuse his official character to purposes of fraud and oppression.

It has consequently been left to the discretion of the officer and the owner of the property, to make their own agreements about the premium for the freight, and these, not being official, have, heretofore, not been made known to this Department; and the sums received cannot, therefore, be stated. It has been thought proper, however, for reasons which will readily present themselves, to require that such a statement should be made upon the subject, as would enable the Department to be perfectly apprised of the conduct of those under its control, and the use they make "of their official stations" in transactions of this kind. An order was, therefore, prepared as a part of the instructions to Commodore Hull, when he took command in the Pacific ocean, a copy of which is hereunto annexed and marked C. The same order has been given to all officers who have been, since that time, in command of squadrons or separate vessels. If any evil have, heretofore, resulted from this provision of our law, it is hoped that a remedy will be found in this order, so far as it is within the power of this Department to apply the remedy. If it be deemed necessary to prescribe the premium, that power properly belongs to the legislature. There has yet been received but one report on the subject, and that does not furnish the precise information which is due in answer to a call from the Senate of the United States.

The paper A exhibits the expense of courts-martial in the navy, in each year in the last three years, with the amounts paid to judge advocates, and others, for their attendance and services. The paper D designates the places at which such courts-martial were ordered to be held, and the stations from which the officers composing the same were detailed to attend.

The number of officers subject to trial by courts-martial, is about 850; the average number of men in the navy is about 3,780.

Neither the expense, nor the number of courts, can be considered large; but it is confidently believed that both may, in future, be lessened, should Congress think proper to make certain provisions on the subject, which will be hereafter alluded to. The allowances to officers attending courts-martials, either as members or witnesses, are traveling expenses, and $1,50 per day, while attending the court; except to those upon the stations where the court is held, whose situation is such that they are not subjected to additional expense. In designating the number of members required by law, care is taken to select such as will create least expense, and whose character and condition, as to the accused, give the best security of justice to him and to the public.

By the reports on the contingent expenses of the navy, which have been referred to, it will be perceived that considerable sums have been paid, at different times, to judge advocates. This has arisen from the fact that there is no person attached to the service, whose legal acquirements and acquaintance with legal proceedings fit him for the discharge of all the duties of the office. The Department would illy perform its obligations, either to the public or the accused, by appointing one to perform them who was incompetent; and those who were qualified, could not be expected to neglect their regular and profitable employments for a temporary engagement, without full compensation.

Paper E exhibits the same information respecting courts-martial in the marine corps, as is exhibited by D, and respecting those in the navy.

Papers F and G exhibit the number of desertions from the marine corps and the number of rank and file confined by imprisonment as a punishment for desertion or misconduct, for each year, during the last three years.

In answer to that portion of the resolution which requires the Secretary of the Navy to report "his opinion on such alterations or further provisions of law, as he may consider it expedient to be made, in order to promote a more perfect discipline of the navy and marine corps, to prevent the frequent recurrence of courts-martial, and ensure to the public service in the said establishments, the highest degree of economy and efficiency," the following remarks are respectfully submitted:

Discipline and the prevention of offences, economy and efficiency, in every military or naval establishment, must depend on its fundamental organization, the regulations connected with it, and their enforcement, and the intelligence and skill of the officers attached to it. There must be a regular and systematic organization, plain and simple rules, skillful and intelligent officers, or no labor, industry, or wisdom in the head which directs it, can produce the desired results to any very profitable extent. But, if these disadvantages exist, a failure to produce those results may well be the subject of censure. The military establishment of the United States is, at this moment, the best possible argument and illustration which can be made upon this point. The naval establishment of the United States may be said never to have had a legal organization. Temporary acts, authorizing specific matters relating to the building of vessels, and the numbers of one or two of our grades of officers, are to be abundantly found: but there is not in our whole code a law giving an organization, prescribing the number and grades of all our officers, number of our yards and stations, pay and emoluments of those who are attached to the service. It requires no labor of argument to show, that, in such a state of things, they who have had to direct, and those who have had to execute, have equally felt the want of fixed and uniform guides to their conduct. The first "alteration" or "provision of law," then, which appears to be necessary to effect the proposed objects, is a law organizing the navy establishment. What that law ought to be in the "opinion" of the Department, will be found in the report of the plan made during the last session of Congress. To that report, therefore, reference is now made. It is necessary only to add, that daily experience, since that time, has confirmed the views then presented. Should a law of that character be passed, it will be important immediately to prepare regulations depending upon, and adapted to it, for the discipline and management of every part of the service. To the formation of these regulations, the best intelligence, within the command of the Department, would, necessarily, be brought; and, being submitted to the wisdom of Congress, their adoption would free from uncertainty, and furnish fixed and safe rules as guides to all.

The Department is not aware of any alteration by law, beyond those specified, which would be necessary for the economical administration of the money concerns of the Department.

Those concerns are divided into two parts: that which relates to the purchase and care of "naval stores and materials, and the construction, armament, and equipment of vessels of war," which is managed by a board of commissioners, under the superintendence of the Secretary; the other, which relates to the pay and compensation of all persons in any way connected with the service, which is exclusively under the direction and control of the head of the Department. The latter, it is believed, has been, heretofore, economically administered; and, under the proposed organization and regulation, with the aid of the laws respecting the advance of public moneys, and the settlement of the public accounts, may be so conducted as to squander nothing, and to lose little.

The former has, heretofore, been managed by the board, in a manner deserving the highest commendation. Its contracts and expenditures have, in general, been judicious, cautious and economical. It was created in February, 1815. The law "concerning disbursements of public money," and forbidding advances, was passed in January, 1823. It has, therefore, existed almost ten years, during eight of which, advances were not forbidden; it has made contracts for, and superintended the expenditure of $15,500,000, and it is believed that nothing has yet been lost, and that not more than $15,000, if any, are in danger of being lost.

It is but just to add, that the members, confining themselves to their prescribed duties, have been found valuable auxiliaries, and that the improvement of our vessels, yards, and equipments, is proof that their skill and science are not inferior to their industry and economy.

The next "alteration," which seems to be called for, is the revision of the law "for the better government of the navy of the United States." It was passed in May, 1800, and has remained without amendment. It relates to offences and trials, punishments and rewards—subjects of great importance in every service. Offences which are the objects of punishment, ought to be plainly and precisely stated, that every one may understand what he is to avoid, and may certainly know when he is criminal; and that those who would bring accusations, may be sure that they do it justly. There is a great defect in the law upon this point; a defect which has been the cause of much inconvenience and relaxation of discipline. It is so extremely vague and indefinite, that it is often not easy to frame a charge, justified by its words, even against those who have acted most incorrectly, without a resort to some general expression, such as "unofficer-like" or "scandalous conduct," and joining to it a specification embracing the particular circumstances, which might as well be added to any other charge, or to no charge. It results that the accused and the court are both in doubt how to proceed; and the legality of what is done is questionable, even where there is hesitation that the accused has been guilty and merits rebuke. The effect may readily be imagined. Among men varying in habits, education, principles, and feelings, there are always some that must be coerced by plain law, rigidly enforced; some who regard the provisions of the law as the only restriction on the freedom of thought and action, which, as citizens, they are accustomed to enjoy. Where it is not clear and explicit, they perform acts, dangerous and reprehensible, which they do not perceive prohibited by positive enactment. Others are induced, by the same cause, to prefer charges for that which they suppose violates the spirit of the code. The former are tempted to irregular and improper conduct; the latter to arraign, without just cause, those who are obnoxious to them. The tribunal, too, which is called to pass upon accusations, is left, without a certain guide, to the exercise of an arbitrary discretion, and to the formation of decisions governed rather by extraneous causes, such as the character and standing of the parties, than a just estimate of the charges and the evidence. Guilt ceases to be the only, yet certain, ground of punishment. The weight of the sentence, whether of condemnation or acquittal, is proportionally diminished. Thus, in every way, does this want of precision and certainty in the law, tend to the multiplication of courts-martial, the destruction of discipline, and of the correspondent efficiency and economy. This law is equally unguarded as to the punishment, leaving everything to the discretion of the court, not only as to its extent, but also as to its nature. "At the discretion of a court-martial," and "death, or such other punishment as a court-martial shall adjudge," are its phraseology; and where the crime is not specified in the meagre list which is given, the punishment is to be "according to the laws and customs of such cases at sea." It is indeed limited by no rule as to kind, and, in most cases, by no extent short of death. It should not remain in this condition. It should be military, and proportioned to the offence. We need not dwell upon the consequences to the accused, the public, and the court, from this cause. The law ought to be altered. The punishment should be ascertained in a proper scale, from private reprimands, through all the grades of public reprimands, suspension from duty, suspension without pay, suspension from rank and pay, dismission and death. But it is not enough that crimes and punishments be properly defined and limited. To the improved law must be added an improved administration of it.

No change is necessary in the organization of our courts. They are composed of the proper persons, and of the proper numbers, but they require aid in the discharge of their duties, which they do not now possess. Although in questions of sound and honorable feeling, they are safe, yet their education and habits are not those best adapted to all the judicial functions. Regularity, correct application of legal principles, even some technicality, is essential to correctness in their proceedings. They, more than ordinary judges, require well defined rules and systems of practice, and they have none such to which they can appeal.

A very small portion of the English system, based upon their statutes, can apply to courts acting under ours. It sometimes happens, that, relying upon British precedents, they are misled; at others fearing to trust them, they wander into error. And when situated as they thus are, we recollect the vital influence which their decisions have upon the fortunes, lives and fame, of so many gallant men, it is impossible not to feel that they ought to have, in their legal advisers, the judge advocates, men of learning, talent and discretion. Such it is always the object of the Department to procure for them; but such cannot always be obtained, and when they are, it is at great expense. They are drawn from other and profitable pursuits, and devote a temporary attention only to the subject. Hence, although much safer aids than less informed and weaker men, they are apt to differ from each other; and the consequence has been, that our courts-martial proceed by no settled rules; form irregular records; often err for want of light; make decisions utterly destructive of character, and of the public interests; and form precedents which serve only to bewilder and perplex those who come after them. Required, then, to give an "opinion" on a remedy for these evils, the Department would recommend, as one means, the appointment of a responsible officer, a judge advocate, whose duty it should be to form, under the direction of the Department, a proper system for the government of courts-martial; to prepare the cases and witnesses for trial; to attend when practicable; and always to examine and report to the Department on the records, and guard against unlawful proceedings and convictions. Many benefits would thereby be secured; there would be more certainty in our trials; the charges would be legal; the causes being properly prepared, there would be less delay; the rules for the proceedings being settled, there would be less error; records be uniform and accurate; economy be promoted, by shortening the terms of the courts, and avoiding the employment of temporary judge advocates; and justice be more surely administered. The same officer, if equal to the station, could perform the duties both for the army and the navy, and would produce results in both, which they only can estimate who have reflected seriously on the high importance of a steady, uniform, consistent and economical administration of criminal law in military and naval establishments, and the incalculably painful consequences which arise from erroneous decisions.

The recommendation, then, as to this law, has three objects: 1st. To define offences. 2d. To fix and apportion punishments. 3d. To provide safe rules for the trials, and a competent officer to aid in the administration of the criminal code. It is perhaps proper to remark, that in recommending the appointment of one judge advocate for the navy and the army, the Secretary of War concurs.

Two other amendments ought to be made in the law: 1. That the court be at least so far freed from the obligation of secrecy, as relates to the officer who constituted it, and who has to approve its sentence: a concealment from him of everything but what appears upon the record, often compels a decision in ignorance of facts most important to a right judgment upon the case; and naturally leaves the members of the court free from the responsibility which ought to attach to them, and which is the best security for correct decision.

2. Power should be given to the court to enforce the attendance of witnesses necessary either for the accusation or defence, and to take the depositions of those who could not attend; a power always essential to the safe administration of justice.

There is still another "alteration" which, in my "opinion," ought to be made, and which is even more important than those already mentioned, to promote discipline, efficiency and economy, and to prevent the recurrence of courts-martial in the service. The establishment of an academy, or providing, in some effectual mode for the instruction of the young officers. These are taken from the poor, who have not the means of a good education, as well as the rich, who have. They enter, from the nature of the duties, at so early an age, that they cannot be accomplished, nor even moderately accurate, scholars. They are constantly employed on ship board, or in our navy yards, where much advancement in learning cannot be expected. Their pay will afford them a support, but no means of literary improvement. The consequence necessarily is, and such is well known to be the fact, that very many advance in age, and rise in grade, much less cultivated and informed than their own reputation and that of the country require. For this evil there is but one remedy, and that is to be found in the wisdom and beneficence of the government, from which they receive their offices, and to whose honor and interest they are devoted. It is the formation of a school which shall combine literary with professional instruction; a competent portion of common learning, with a profound knowledge of everything connected with military science, seamanship and navigation; the theory with the practice of their profession. The considerations which urge respect for this recommendation, are connected with everything which the nation has to hope from its naval establishment. They may be glanced at, but cannot be suitably discussed in this report. The situation of our country; the nature of its territory and its coasts; the extent of its commerce; the character of its institutions, and its political connections—all point unerringly to that establishment as the security for its peace and its honor. It no longer remains a debatable question, whether we shall look to the navy as one of the means by which our interests are to be most cheaply and most securely protected. It has been settled by a course of events, which have carried the nation forward to a point where, on this subject, it has scarcely the liberty to choose. It has interests to protect, and duties to discharge, which it cannot, if it would, disregard.

The problem now to be solved by it is, in what mode our naval means may be commanded most surely, and with the least possible burthen, combining most efficiency with the smallest expense.

The answer is believed to be plain. By giving to our officers the greatest amount of science and skill, by fitting all to command the vessels we may choose to build and the seamen we may be enabled to enlist. By these means, and these only, may we, in times of quiet, keep in employment, as small a number of vessels as our commerce may absolutely require; and yet, at the moment of trouble, swell it to the full extent which our protection may demand, and the number of our seamen will permit; the latter being the only limit which can be placed to our naval power. It is not, however, in this circumstance alone, that well instructed officers will induce economy: the better instructed and more intelligent an officer is, the more skillfully and precisely, and, of course, the more economically, will he perform the duties assigned him. Ignorance is always, skill never, prodigal. There is no business, profession, or occupation, in the circle of society, to which this principle applies with more energy than to our naval establishment. Discipline and efficiency also, necessarily, result from the same cause. Educated in such a school as it becomes the government to establish, moral principles are secured, good habits formed, subordination learned, honorable feelings encouraged and confirmed, skill acquired, science and discipline necessarily combined.

The illustration of these truths is before us in another branch of our national defence, to which the favor of the government has been extended: and the suggestion will be pardoned, that no sound argument can be urged in its favor, which does not receive additional force from the situation in which the navy is placed, and the interests and hopes which are connected with it.

Our future national conflicts are to rest principally on it, come when they may. It is, also, the bearer of our honor and our fame to every foreign shore. The American naval officer is, in fact, the representative of his country in every port to which he goes; and by him is that country, in a greater or less degree, estimated. With a well regulated national pride, this consideration alone should ensure him ample means of instruction and improvement.

A school, to be useful to the navy, must combine theory with practice. It must, therefore, be located where the attention may be directed to the construction, equipment, armament, and sailing of vessels. Governor's Island, in the harbor of New York, seems to be well fitted for all these objects. The buildings and improvements already upon it, with slight alterations and repairs, would, probably, be sufficient for present accommodation; and if the public interests would permit its transfer, for a time, from the War to the Navy Department, and an appropriation were made of $10,000, for the support of instructors, the school might be put into operation with very little delay, and its permanent location be hereafter determined.

I beg leave to refer to a report from this Department, dated 1st day of January, 1824, expressing an opinion of the propriety and necessity of augmenting the number of our sloops of war, as a means of increasing the efficiency and economy of the service; and to add, that the experience of the past year, has amply confirmed the reason there presented.

There are other alterations which are not suggested, as they are supposed to be within the powers of the Department. Some have been made within the last year, and others will hereafter receive attention.

Among the former, are, the general order which was issued respecting the arrest and trial of officers, a copy of which is annexed, and marked H; and a regulation by which any person, before he can receive an appointment as surgeon's mate, or, being a mate, be promoted to the rank of surgeon, must pass, successfully, a rigid examination, before a board of competent surgeons, both as to his moral character and his professional attainments, especially in all that relates to the duties of his particular office. The operation of these rules need not be explained; they have thus far been found most salutary.

The preceding remarks contain the "opinion" called for by the resolution, so far as respects the navy.

In relation to the marine corps, I have the honor to submit various papers marked 1 and 2, which contain the views presented by the commandant of the corps in reference to its numbers and organization. They furnish satisfactory evidence that an augmentation of it is required, and justice seems to demand that its organization, as to grade and number of officers, should correspond with its size. The same principles are applicable to it as have been urged in reference to the navy, and which apply to all military establishments.

An arrangement will be made with the War Department, by which the officers of this corps will hereafter be taken from the graduates at West Point.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, &c.,

SAM. L. SOUTHARD.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Fourth Auditor's Office, November 26, 1824.

B.

Rules and regulations for the government of the recruiting service of the navy of the United States.

Recruiting establishments shall be made at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, and, in the event of a great demand for seamen, at Norfolk.

At each of those places an officer of the rank of master commandant shall be stationed, assisted by a surgeon or surgeon's mate, belonging to the station, to attend the rendezvous, and a lieutenant and master's mate, or midshipman, to take charge of the men on board a receiving ship, which shall be furnished with a guard of marines. The men, while on board the receiving ship, shall be employed under the direction of the commanding naval officer of the station in making plats, gaskets, and other useful public works which shall not make it necessary for them to be put on shore, and every attention must be paid to their cleanliness and comfort.

The receiving ship shall be stationed some distance from the port, and made to answer the purposes of a guard vessel.

The officer engaged in the recruiting service is enjoined—

To use every exertion to procure as speedily as possible the number of men required;

To enter none but sound, healthy men;

To advance only such amount of pay as may be authorized from time to time;

To take good security in all cases of advance, except as hereinafter excepted;

To take receipts in duplicate for every payment made by him;

To obtain recruiting money from the purser or agent, as the case may be, under the authority of the captain or commanding officer;

To account weekly for the expenditure of all recruiting money to the purser or agent from whom it may have been received; and

To make weekly to this Department a report agreeably to form No. 1.

When a ship shall be in a port where a rendezvous may be opened, and there being no recruiting establishment at such place, the captain of such ship may select a suitable recruiting officer; but if the captain shall select for such service an improper officer, or neglect to cause such recruiting officer to account weekly, and any evil should, in either case, arise, the captain shall be held responsible.

When necessary to open rendezvous for a ship at any place other than that where she may be lying, the captain shall not be permitted to do so without the consent of this Department. His duty, in such case, is to apprise the Department of the necessity of opening such rendezvous, and, should he think proper, recommend the officer to be employed; and the Department, judging it expedient, will issue the necessary orders. Should the officer ordered on such service be sent to any place where there may not be a regular recruiting establishment, he shall make his requisitions on the commanding officer of the station, who will cause the necessary supplies to be furnished, and a weekly account of expenditures to be rendered; and when such rendezvous shall be closed, the vouchers shall be delivered to the purser of the ship to which the men shall belong; and his receipt and certificate that the vouchers are correct according to form No. 2 shall be transmitted, forthwith, by the recruiting officer to the accountant of the navy, to enable him to credit the amount of the advances, together with the allowance for recruiting in the officer's recruiting account on the books of his office.

The recruiting officer shall be allowed, in addition to his pay and rations, in lieu of all charges and expenses, the sum of four dollars for each man recruited and mustered on board the receiving ship, the transport, or the ship to which he may belong, but he shall never be allowed credit for sums lost by desertion before the delivery of the men on ship board. He is to take good security, and hold such security accountable, until the men shall be mustered on board the receiving ship, the transport, or the ship to which they may belong.

Should men desert from the receiving ship, or the transport, the officer having charge of them shall make oath as to the circumstances of their desertion, agreeably to form No. 3, which oath shall be forwarded to this Department, and an order issued, before the recruiting officer shall receive credit on the purser's books for the amount advanced; and if the officer having charge of such men, on board such receiving ship or transport, should not be able to prove, to the satisfaction of the commanding officer, whose certificate, agreeably to form No. 4, must be transmitted to this Department, that all due care and precaution were taken by him to prevent such desertion, he shall be held accountable for the amount of money advanced to such deserters.

When men are first entered on board the ship to which they belong, the certificate of the commanding officer must be taken, agreeably to form No. 5, stating their number, grade, and condition; and if it shall on examination appear that any of them are infirm or unfit for the service, a survey shall be held on them by the surgeon and principal officers of the ship, and if reported by them as unfit for service, agreeably to form No. 6, they shall be sent on shore, and the recruiting officer shall lose the amount advanced to them, unless he shall produce the certificate of the surgeon or surgeon's mate attending the rendezvous, that such person or persons, so declared unfit for service, were at the time they were entered, sound and healthy; in which case such surgeon, or surgeon's mate, shall be held accountable.

The surgeon or surgeon's mate, appointed to attend the rendezvous, to examine persons offering to enter, is to reject those that may be decrepid, lame, blind, deaf, dumb, feeble, sickly, or diseased; and to give to the recruiting officer his certificate, agreeably to form No. 7, of such as may be sound and healthy.

The recruiting officer, at a regular station, shall be allowed one officer from each of the ships for which he may be recruiting; and such assistant officer, upon the certificate of the recruiting officer, shall be allowed one dollar and fifty cents per day for the time he may be employed at the recruiting station, and no longer. Such certificate must be countersigned by the commanding officer of the station, and upon such certificate, so countersigned, the purser of the ship, to which such assistant officer may belong, shall pay him accordingly, keeping the certificate and officer's receipt as his vouchers in the settlement of his account with this Department.

When men are to be transported from distant places, the recruiting officer must apply to the commanding officer of the station for the means, and, if necessary, for officers to take charge of them; and if the commanding officer should not have a public vessel at his disposal, it shall be his duty to direct the agent of the station to furnish private conveyance; the expense to be paid by the agent, and charged under the proper head of appropriation.

In no case shall a recruiting officer have more than one thousand dollars advanced him at any one time. When the advance received shall be accounted for, he may, on his requisition, countersigned by the commanding officer of the station, obtain a further supply from the agent of the station, if an officer of the rank of master commandant and employed at a regular recruiting establishment; and from the purser of the ship or station, if the recruiting officer be of an inferior grade.

While men are on board the receiving ship, they shall receive no supplies of clothing or other articles, from the purser of the station, but on the requisition of the recruiting officer, countersigned by the commanding officer of the station; nor shall such purser receive a credit for the same from the purser of the ship to which the men may belong, until the requisition, so countersigned, the men's receipt for the articles, and the account therefor, approved by the recruiting officer and the commanding officer of the station, shall be delivered to such ship's purser.

That seamen may be rescued, as far as is practicable, from the fangs of rapacious, unprincipled persons who, frequently taking advantage of their habits and unsuspicious character, swindle them of the whole amount advanced to them by the recruiting officer, and to the great prejudice of the seamen and the service generally, leave them in a naked and destitute condition at the time of their appearance on board, the recruiting officer is expressly enjoined not to deliver the advance to any other than the men enlisted, to use his utmost influence to induce all persons enlisting to repair on board the receiving ship, with their clothing, in which case he shall be authorized to make the customary advance, without taking security; and he is to pay particular attention to collecting and sending on board all clothing and other effects of seamen and others, entered for the service, and to take every means in his power to render the service as pleasing as possible.

[CIRCULAR.]

Serious inconveniences and loss having been sustained, by the enlistment of persons into the naval service, who are incompetent to the performance of their respective duties; it has become necessary that the following additional regulations be henceforward rigidly enforced:

1st. Recruiting officers are to use every exertion to procure, as expeditiously as possible, the number of men which may be required; but they are to enter none but sound, healthy men, and such as are qualified to perform the duties of the station for which they may be entered. They are to enter none but citizens of the United States, except by special orders from the Department.

Every person offering to enlist shall be carefully examined by a surgeon or surgeon's mate of the navy, or, if none such is attached to the station, by some competent physician, who shall certify to his being sound and healthy, before he shall be enlisted, or entitled to receive any advance of pay, or gratuity of any kind whatever, and the certificate signed by the surgeon, surgeon's mate, or physician as aforesaid, shall be countersigned by the recruiting officer, and forwarded with the person enlisted to the commander of the vessel to which he may be sent.

When practicable, some vessel will be designated to receive men entered for the navy, and stationed at or near the recruiting rendezvous, and the commander of said vessel shall take charge of and receipt for such men as may be sent him by the recruiting officer, which receipt shall exonerate thereafter the recruiting officer from any liability on account of the desertion of those persons mentioned in it. Within six days after the delivery by the recruiting officer of any men on board the receiving vessel, or, where none is provided, on board the vessel to which they may be assigned, it shall be the duty of the senior officer in command upon the station, upon the application of the recruiting officer or commander of the receiving vessel, to direct two medical and three commissioned sea officers, if there shall be so many upon the station, to examine carefully such recruits, as to their health, qualifications, and national character, and all such as they, or a majority of them, shall pronounce to be unfit for service, or enlisted contrary to the directions of the Department, shall forthwith be reported by them to the said senior officer in command upon the station, who shall forward one copy of the report of survey to the Secretary of the Navy, one to the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, and one to the officer by whom the men may have been entered. If persons appointed by the commander of a station, as provided in the preceding section, shall be of opinion that the recruiting officer, surgeon, or surgeon's mate, whose duty it was to have examined the men at the time of their enlistment, might, with proper attention, have ascertained the unfitness for service, or other disqualification, of any person whom they may have found cause to reject, they shall in their certificate particularly state such opinion, and the person whom they may believe to have been guilty of the neglect, that any loss which shall be sustained by the improper enlistment may be charged to the person through whose neglect it was incurred.

No recruiting officer shall receive credit for any moneys advanced, unless he produce the receipt of the person to whom it was paid, the certificate of the purser of the vessel to which they may be sent, that their accounts have been received and charged, and the certificate of the officers of the survey ordered by the senior officers in command, as directed by these instructions, stating that no loss had been incurred through his neglect or misconduct in the enlistment of improper persons.

Extract of a letter to Capt. Isaac Hull, dated —

DECEMBER 24, 1823.

Our national vessels ought not, and must not, be used for purposes of commercial adventure. You may receive on board specie and the articles permitted by the "act for the better government of the navy," belonging exclusively to our own citizens, and carry them from one port or place to another, when it does not, in any degree, interfere with your other duties, or violate the laws of the country where you are. You may also bring to the United States specie belonging to our own citizens, but you are in no case to permit anything in the shape or character of public advertisements to be used, for the purpose of giving information that you will carry them. So many complaints have been publicly made on this subject, that you will carefully abstain from everything which can give rise to unfriendly comments; and that the government may know the extent to which the commercial interests of our citizens are benefited by the assistance afforded by our public vessels on this point, and be prepared to answer any complaints on the subject which may be made by individuals or governments, you will, from time to time, make reports to this Department of all the specie and other articles you may carry, the places to and from which you carry them, and the circumstances, terms, and conditions, under which you do it.

HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE MARINE CORPS, Washington, December 24, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to the Department the details of the courts-martial for the last three years, viz: the places where the courts were held, the names of the members of the court, and the stations from whence these members were ordered.

I take occasion here to observe that the expenses of almost the whole of the courts held on non-commissioned officers and privates have been paid, by the sentences of the courts, out of the pay of such of the prisoners as were convicted. During that period but six courts have been held for the trial of commissioned officers; consequently the expenses incurred by their convention are all that have been paid by the government during the above period of three years, for courts-martial in the marine corps.

I remain, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

ARCHIBALD HENDERSON, Lieut. Colonel Commanding.

E.

The number of desertions from the United States marine corps, between the 1st of November, 1821, and the 31st of October, 1824, was six hundred and ninety-six; the number of men who produced that number of desertions, was six hundred and seven; the number taken was two hundred and sixty-five; and the number tried for desertion was one hundred and fifty-one.

SENTENCE OF THE COURT.

No. 4. To pay all the expenses of his apprehension and trial; to repay all moneys advanced to him by the government on his enlistment in the army of the United States, and to be kept five months at hard labor with ball and chain.

No. 12. To hard labor for six months, with ball and chain, in the marine barrack at head-quarters, and his payment of his portion of expenses in the trial.

No. 18. To be reduced to the ranks as a private soldier; to be kept in the cells, in solitary confinement, upon bread and water, for the term of four months; after the expiration of which term, he is to serve eight months at hard labor, with a ball and chain attached to his leg, and to have half his monthly pay stopped during the twelve months in which he shall be undergoing this punishment; and, at the expiration of that time, to be drummed out of the service with a rope round his neck.

No. 20. To pay the reward offered for his apprehension, and to pay his proportion of the expenses incident to his desertion and trial; and to have his head shaved, and drummed out of garrison.

No. 21. To be confined in the guard house, and do the garrison duty; to have his rations, of his pay stopped, and to pay the expenses of desertion and trial.

No. 28. To six months' hard labor, with a ball and chain attached to him; to forfeit all the pay that is and may be due him at the expiration of that period.

No. 31. To wear the ball and chain, at hard labor, for two years; to forfeit his pay, for that period, with the exception of so much of it as will defray his proportion of the expenses of this court, and the expenses attending his desertion; and at the end of the above time, to have one-half of his head shaved, the opposite side of his face blacked, and to be drummed out of garrison, with a halter round his neck.

No. 33. To six months' hard labor, with ball and chain; and to forfeit the pay that is and may be due him during that period, and out of the above forfeiture, to pay his proportion of the expenses of his trial; but, in consideration of his having been so short a time in the service, the court recommend him to the commandant of the corps for a remission of four months of the above penishment. Remitted.

No. 48. To hard labor, with a ball and chain, for four months, to be removed whenever the commanding officer of the post may deem it necessary to the good of the public service; to pay, out of any money that is now or may be hereafter due him, the said Thomas Britt, all the expenses attending his desertion and trial.

No. 50. To be reduced to the ranks; to six months' ball and chain, and to pay all expenses incident to trial and desertion.

No. 62. To six months' hard labor with ball and chain, in the marine barracks at head-quarters, and to pay his portion of the expenses of this court.

No. 63. To twelve months' hard labor, with the ball and chain; to forfeit his pay, now due and to grow due in that period of time, to be appropriated to the reimbursement of the expenses of his apprehension and trial.

No. 66. To six months' hard labor, with ball and chain, and pay the expenses of his trial.

No. 68. To six months' hard labor, with ball and chain; to pay his proportion of the expenses incident to his desertion and trial; but in consideration of his intention to return to barracks, as manifested to the court, the court respectfully recommend him to the commandant of the corps for a remission of three months of the hard labor with ball and chain.

No. 81. To three months' hard labor with ball and chain, and to pay his proportion of the expenses of his trial.

No. 84. To be confined to the barracks, upon usual duty, for three months, and pay the expenses of his trial.

No. 86. To be returned to the post from whence he deserted, at Gosport, Virginia, and that he pay all the expenses attending his desertion, and the expenses of this court, and be confined to hard labor, with ball and chain, for twelve months.

No. 87. To nine months' ball and chain; to have his rations of whiskey stopped, and pay the expenses of desertion and trial.

No. 94. To pay all the expenses of his apprehension and trial; to repay all the moneys advanced to him by the government on his enlistment in the army of the United States, and to be kept six months at hard labor, with ball and chain.

No. 101. To hard labor, with ball and chain, during the remainder of his term of enlistment; to forfeit all the pay which is or may be due him during the above period; and that the expenses of his desertion and apprehension, and his proportion of the expenses of this court, be paid out of the above forfeiture; that, at the expiration of the above period, he be drummed out of the garrison.

No. 105. To six months' hard labor, with a ball and chain attached to his leg; to pay all the expenses attending his desertion and trial, the same to be deducted out of any pay that is now or may be hereafter due him.

No. 114. To three months' ball and chain; to have his rations of whiskey stopped, and to pay the expenses of desertion and trial.

No. 115. To twelve months' ball and chain; to have his rations of whiskey stopped, and to pay the expenses of desertion and trial.

No. 116. HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE MARINE CORPS,
Adjutant and Inspector's Office, Washington, November 18, 1824.

II.

Copy of a general order dated 5th March, 1824.

After the receipt of this order, no officer within the United States shall be arrested without the sanction of this Department. When complaint is made against any officer, his commanding officer may, at his discretion, suspend him until the directions of the Secretary of the Navy are received, and it shall be the duty of said commanding officer, forthwith, to furnish to the Department, through the proper channel, a statement of the charges against him, with the names of the witnesses by whom they are to be proved, and facts to be proved by each witness.

The officer suspended shall also be furnished with a statement of the charges against him, and directed to furnish to the commanding officer, to be forwarded to the Department, such explanatory statement as he may wish to make, with the names of the witnesses by which it is to be supported.

You will communicate this order to the officers under your command.

No. 1.

HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE MARINE CORPS, Washington, 22d November, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to hand you, herewith, a return of the desertions and trials that have taken place in the marine corps, from the 1st November, 1821, up to the 31st October, 1824, as directed agreeable to a resolution of the honorable the Senate of the United States.

Since I had the honor to address you last on the subject of a reorganization and increase of the marine corps, the causes which then existed for such changes as were proposed, have not only continued, but have multiplied upon the service to a considerable extent; and some of the arguments then only urged as matters of reasonable anticipation have been fully realized by events since that period.

The memorial of the officers of the corps, addressed to you in November last, and my letter, with the papers accompanying it, of the 16th of February, contain most of the material facts in support of the plan of reorganization submitted at that time; and in calling your attention again, sir, to the consideration of these papers, I must repeat my approbation of the memorial, and my knowledge of the facts set forth therein, and beg leave to place it before you, together with the letter I then wrote and my letter of the 16th of February last, as embracing nearly all the remarks deemed necessary on the present occasion.

The number of men now on detail for sea service, and the situation of the different posts, make it my duty so far to change the plan of the last year as to propose 1,240 privates and a due proportion of field officers, captains, lieutenants, &c., &c., for a permanent peace establishment. The statement enclosed herewith will show that the public interest requires this increase, and I will add that a smaller number will not meet the demands of the service, if the ships and the navy yards are to be guarded, as has heretofore been the custom. I cannot dismiss this part of the subject without urging upon your notice, sir, the severe nature of the duties now performed by the marines at every navy yard in the United States. To afford such relief to the soldier as is common in all services, there should be for each sentinel nine efficient men; whereas the stations have been all so drained by the late requisitions for sea service, that the guards had rarely a relief; and the depots at Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Norfolk, will be unable to perform the duties required of them with less than sixty men added to the present strength of each. At Portsmouth, N. H., thirty men more are wanting; and the station at head-quarters, including the guards at the navy yard, magazine and capitol, require at least one hundred and twenty men, in addition to their present force.

You will perceive, sir, that I have included one hundred men for the contemplated southern station; but should this design be abandoned by the government, we shall still have ample employment for them all. Some allowance should also be made for a number of men taken from the line and usefully employed as armorers and carpenters; for sickness, and for vacancies arising out of the various casualties of a military body. Moreover, in the distribution proposed on the increase no provision is made for the contingency of a further demand for sea service; and, should all the men asked for be granted, we could not more than supply the guard of a seventy-four, should no other shore station be established.

The great deficiencies in the corps present themselves as matters of serious consideration; and, as it is now full, they cannot be supplied but by the increase recommended; and, should it be necessary to fit out a large ship of war, in the present state of things, one of the stations, at least, must be entirely broken up to furnish her guard. It may not be amiss to remark that during the late war, when there was at no time as many marines afloat as at present, it was thought necessary to keep up a force of more than two thousand men.

I have hitherto neglected to impress upon you, sir, the necessity of maintaining a larger force than has been usual of late years, at the head-quarters of the corps. One of the chief objects in the establishment of this post, next to the location of the commandant and staff, was for the purpose of drilling recruits, and new appointments, and fitting them for the various duties required by the service. But so bare have these barracks been of men for the last five years, that this design of the government has been almost entirely defeated; and we are scarce able to get up a drill, by suspending all the work of the armorers and carpenters, and others, engaged in constant daily duty. Nothing is so well calculated to give character to a corps as a uniformity of system, and the initiation of young officers into the duties of their profession by the same hand, and under the immediate notice and auspices of its commanding officer. For this purpose they are placed first in the hands of the adjutant and inspector of the corps, an officer always selected for his professional accomplishments; but situated as we now are, without the advantage of a sufficient number of men for battalion drill, he can carry them no further than the duties of a morning parade, and the ceremonies of relieving a guard. A young officer should never be permitted to leave head-quarters before he is perfectly competent to the drill of a battalion, so that should he succeed by accident, or other causes, to command, he might be able to do justice to his situation.

It is often the case here, as well as at other stations, that men are as much as ten days successively on guard; and when I account to you, sir, in this way, for the long list of desertions handed you herewith, I must add my surprise that they are not of more frequent occurrence.

If the proposed augmentation be recommended by the Department, the necessity of such an increase and arrangement of officers as is suggested, will be found not only just, but indispensably necessary. You will excuse me, sir, if, in my solicitude in relation to the officers of the corps I have the honor to command, I urge their claims again most earnestly upon your consideration. In proposing that the commandant of the corps be raised to the rank of colonel, it will not be esteemed immodest, when it is considered that his command is already one-fourth larger than that of a colonel in the army; and should the proposed plan of increase be adopted, will more than double, in its magnitude, and consequently in its responsibility, the command of an officer of that grade, as the regiments are at present established. Let me also remind you, sir, that it is desirable to raise the commandant of the marine corps to the rank of colonel, to remove the doubts and scruples that have hitherto existed, as to the legality of courts-martial convened under his order; and may I not add, as another reason, the justice of allowing an officer of marines as much to look to in his own corps, as an officer in the army has in his regiment? and more particularly, as I have before had occasion to remark, when it is considered that the latter have the whole army for their hopes and prospects.

The officers necessary to the marine corps, in case the proposed increase shall take place, and the smallest number indeed by which such an establishment can be properly managed, will be in grade, and number, as follows:

One colonel commandant, one lieutenant colonel, two majors, sixteen captains, twenty-five first lieutenants, twenty second lieutenants.

This increase of officers is proposed upon grounds of the strictest expediency. The field officers, it will be seen, on comparison, do not bear near the same proportion to the number of men, that the field officers of the army do to their regiments, for while the latter have three field officers to every five hundred men, we ask but four to upwards of twelve hundred. In the army, every fifty men is provided with a captain; whereas a captain is only proposed for every eighty men in the marine corps; and one or two of this class of officers generally fill situations in the staff, which, from their importance, require experience and talent; and a corps serving in detachments, as the marines ever have, and ever must do, requires more officers of rank than a body of men consolidated.

More than half the captains at present in the corps, have been nearly twelve years in that grade; and have all been from twelve to twenty years in service; and by referring to the archives of the department, you will find, sir, that several of them were breveted during the late war, for distinguished services. The elder of the first lieutenants have not only served from seven to ten years, but for several years past have been doing the duty of captains.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ARCHD. HENDERSON, Lieutenant Colonel Commandant.

No. 2.

Head-quarters of the Marine Corps, Washington, November 23, 1823.

Sir: In connection with the letter I had the honor to address you of yesterday's date, I must beg leave to bring to your recollection that part of my letter of the 16th February last, that relates to the appointment of cadets from the Military academy into the marine corps. So well am I convinced of the importance of this subject, and so strong are the reasons that induce me to call it up to your notice again, that I consider it a part of the duty I owe to the country, and to the situation I have the honor to fill.

It needs no argument to prove, that, as the duties performed by the marines are essentially military, so the nearer they approximate to the perfection of this character, the more efficient and useful will they be to the service; and whatever physical or mental qualities the private soldier may possess, they are comparatively useless, unless directed with skill and ability.

There are many valuable officers in the marine corps, who have been chosen from among the citizens; and although young gentlemen do often present themselves for commissions, whose pretensions are of the first character, and who have qualities to become as useful ultimately as they could be made by any system of education, yet, there is a consideration belonging to this part of the subject, of the first importance to the service; and while the Department shall continue to fill the corps in the manner hitherto practiced, the evils attendant upon it must ever be of the most embarrassing character, as I shall proceed to show.

It is a fact to be much lamented, that young men without merit, or any qualification indeed whatever for military life, file as honorable testimonials of character in the Department, as the most worthy; and the Secretary in making a selection to fill the vacancies that occur, having no other criterion by which to be governed, cannot avoid at times making unfortunate nominations, and it is with no small degree of mortification that I feel myself called upon to state that, within the last nine years, nearly, or quite half the appointments in the corps have been dismissed, or compelled to resign, for worthlessness, and ungentlemanly conduct; and those who have proved worthy of their commissions are in a still smaller proportion to the number on whom they have been conferred.

One of the unhappy consequences of this state of things, is, that useless and inefficient officers have sometimes so accumulated upon our hands, that it has often been a difficult matter to find enough fitted for the commands at sea, and the commanding officers of the different stations, who are compelled, from the nature of circumstances, to bear for years with such men, so far from feeling the confidence that should ever be due to a commission, are constantly on the watch to see that they acquit themselves of their trust, and next to the performance of their own peculiar duties, feel it their first obligation to the corps, and to the country, to expel them from the service.

By appointing cadets into the corps, this great evil will be effectually guarded against, and it but rarely happens that a graduate from West Point is not a gentleman in his deportment, as well as a soldier in his education. But, sir, it is proper to remark, that young gentlemen who are regularly educated for military life, will not consent to limit their hopes of promotion to the marine corps, as it stands at present, and while we claim the same advantages from the Military academy that are enjoyed by every corps of the army, it is but fair that we should offer them the same inducements to join us.

If it is contemplated by the government that the marine corps shall keep pace with the gradual rise of the navy, (and from the nature of its duties one may be considered the necessary consequence of the other) the appointment of its officers cannot be too carefully made, and the recollection of former difficulties, both with the navy and among ourselves, from unfortunate selections for the corps, as well as the hope of avoiding them for the future, make this subject, not only one of great solicitude to myself, but of the first importance to the welfare of the service.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ARCHD. HENDERSON, Lieutenant Colonel Commandant.

To the honorable Secretary of the Navy.

HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE MARINE CORPS, Washington, November 18, 1823.

SIR: I have the honor to report that I have made a tour of inspection, during the summer and autumn, and visited the guards of the marine corps stationed at the navy yards of Portsmouth, N. H., Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Norfolk. I found those guards in good order, and as effective as their diminished force would allow. The increased demand for the sea service, has rendered it necessary to reduce these guards to such an extent as not to leave a sufficient force to supply the number of sentinels necessary for the protection of the public property in the yards, even though I was obliged to authorize, with the consent of the late Secretary of the Navy, the enlistment of soldiers beyond the number authorized by law. As it is not probable, the number of marines required for sea service will be at all diminished, I deem it my duty to recommend an increase of the corps, and enclose for your consideration a paper drawn up by the officers, in which they point out the disadvantages under which the corps now labors, and pray you to give your assistance in applying a remedy.

I do not myself think that any change in the organization of the corps, except an increase, is necessary, though I agree with the officers in the opinion that it is important to introduce a knowledge of artillery duty more extensively than it now exists. This end can as readily be obtained under its present organization as it could be if it were changed by law into a corps of marine artillery, as well as of marine infantry, which is its present character, but may be extended as well by an order as by law. In recommending an increase of the corps to the extent stated by the officers, I take occasion to observe that the guards at the different navy yards are useful not only in the protection of the public property in the yards, but also as a force from which all the requisitions for the sea service are supplied. If those guards acted in no other capacity than simply to protect the property in the yards, it would still be doubtful whether it would be to the public advantage to adopt any other system; and as a force of the marine corps must necessarily be kept at or near each navy yard, in order to prepare guards for the vessels of war which may be fitted out therefrom, and to supply any deficiencies in the guards of such vessels as may arrive, I am induced to think that the public interest would be endangered, if not sacrificed, by any change. That these guards have faithfully performed their duties is so well established, that it is wholly unnecessary to go into any detailed proof of this fact.

The act of Congress of 1798 organized the marine corps as a military body, authorizing a detachment of guards on board the armed vessel, and to become, while acting in that character, amalgamated with the navy, and subject to the rules and regulations adopted for its government. It is the opinion of many high officers in the navy that the guards at the different navy yards should assume the same character with those on board the armed vessels. The experience of twenty-five years will show that this change is not rendered necessary by any want of efficiency in the guards, or by any insubordinate or improper conduct on the part of the officers of the corps who have commanded them. The argument used by the naval officers to enforce their position is, that there should be a complete unity of command not only in substance but in form.

The substance of command they now have, as the commanding marine officer is positively directed to furnish any number of sentinels his force will admit of, that the naval officers may think necessary to protect the public property and to place them wherever those officers may require. If the views of the government in establishing those guards have not been fulfilled, if the public property in the yards has been lost or destroyed, by their neglect, or if the officers have not evinced every disposition to carry into effect the views of the commandants of the yards, then I say it is necessary to make a change. If the contrary is the fact, and all the objects expected from them have been obtained, I would ask if any change which goes to effect the independence of commands so long existing can be justified? If the public interest require the change, let it take place. If the only argument in favor of it is simply to introduce a unity of command to concentrate in the very officers who used the argument, I should beg leave to question its validity and to ask your candid and deliberate consideration of the subject before you determine on recommending any alteration. The direction of the distribution of the guards as sentinels belongs already to the naval officers; the number and location of those sentinels are also under their direction. The vital interest of the marine officer induces him to comply with the views of the naval officer as fully as he possibly can. The evidence that he has always done so, rests on the simple facts that no injury has arisen for twenty-five years, of a serious character. The marine corps is, and must continue to be, an appendage of the navy, participating in its prosperity or sharing in its adversity—in war braving with it the same dangers, and in peace asking of it nothing but sheer justice. In the latter we have harmoniously and sedulously performed our duties; in the former we have fought side by side with our brethren of the navy, and if a Hull survived to reap the benefits and honors of the victory over the Guerriere, a Bush sealed it with his life's blood.

Before I close this communication, I will state that the station at head-quarters is highly useful, and indeed indispensably necessary in drilling the officers appointed in the corps, and has no doubt essentially contributed to its invariable effectiveness on whatever service it has been heretofore employed.

In conclusion, I beg leave to call your attention to the importance of filling all future vacancies in the corps from the graduates of the academy at West Point. A general knowledge of military science is essentially useful in every military body. If the appointments continue to be made as they now are, that object cannot be obtained, and the marine corps will be deprived of the advantages that every other branch of the service enjoys.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

ARCHIBALD HENDERSON, Lieutenant Colonel Commandant.

The Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy.

A general return of the marine corps is enclosed, showing its present distribution, marked A.

No. 4.

WASHINGTON, November 19, 1825.

SIR: The undersigned, officers of the United States marine corps, viewing you as the official guardian of their interests, and the Department over which you preside as the proper medium through which to make all such representations to the government as their situation may call for, and with feelings of great personal deference for yourself, have the honor most respectfully to submit to your consideration, and through you to the consideration of the President and the Congress of the United States, certain facts in relation to that branch of the military service of the nation in which the undersigned have the honor to be engaged. They deem it unnecessary to trouble you with the many and obvious evils arising from the present organization of the marine corps. They are well known and understood at the Department. But the undersigned are called upon, as well out of respect to themselves as to the general good and improvement of the service, to make such a representation of the most prominent of them, as will reach the authorities, who alone have the power of applying the adequate remedies.

Great and mortifying as are the peculiar disadvantages under which the undersigned are serving, and much as they have reason to lament the hardships of their situation, their solicitude in their own behalf is but secondary to the great consideration of making themselves a more useful auxiliary to the navy, and thus, of promoting in a more extensive degree than they can at present, the usefulness and welfare of the strong arm of our national defence; and the undersigned can with the more propriety urge those facts jointly, and in connection with each other, as the same law that affects the one object may be made to accomplish the other.

The undersigned beg leave, in the first place, to engage your attention upon an important part of their subject, involving considerations of mutual interest to the navy and to themselves. The marines constitute a part of, and are a highly useful appendage to the navy, and any change in the organization of the corps, calculated to make it a more serviceable and vigorous branch of our naval establishment, may be looked upon as a benefit to the nation at large. They are acknowledged by our naval commanders to be indispensable to the service, and their efficiency in close action, and the execution they have done upon the enemy's decks, has called forth many tokens of applause from our best and most distinguished officers. It would be the great pride of the undersigned, to be placed upon a footing of still more extensive usefulness, and to be enabled to add to their own credit by a more active agency in contributing to the glory of their country.

We are ambitious to be of equal importance in every situation in which a ship may be placed in battle. A vessel may be engaged in action under such circumstances, as to make it of the utmost consequence that the marines should be able to manage the great guns with skill and promptitude. This might be the case when ships are engaged at long shot; in the event of great slaughter of the crew by an enemy's fire; the reduction of the effective force of the ship by boat expeditions, or in the manning of batteries on shore, &c., &c.

To place the corps upon such a footing of usefulness as is contemplated by the undersigned, it will be necessary to reörganize it, and establish it with the double character of marine infantry and marine artillery; with a suitable provision of field pieces for each command. This arrangement would not only qualify the officers of marines to command a division of guns in a ship of war when it might be necessary, but it would also make the corps eminently useful in defending our forts upon the seaboard in case of attack. Should the proposed change in the system of the corps meet your approbation, and be regarded as of sufficient importance to engage the attention of Congress, the undersigned would most earnestly call upon you, sir, not only as the proper medium of making known their grievances, but as the source through which they are sanguine of having them redressed, to present to the notice of that honorable body the peculiarly unpromising condition of the marine corps in its present state, and the comparative disadvantages under which its officers serve with every other branch of the military institutions of the country.

In the army, a regiment of infantry is commanded by a colonel, with a lieutenant colonel and major, ten captains, ten first and ten second lieutenants. A regiment of artillery has the same complement of field officers and captains, with twenty first lieutenants; while the marine corps, dispersed through all the navy yards in the United States, and serving in every sea, involving a responsibility of the most extensive character upon the commandant, is commanded by a lieutenant colonel, without any other field officer, and with but nine captains to twenty-four first and sixteen second lieutenants. Thus, sir, you will perceive, that an officer on entering the army, were his hopes circumscribed to a single regiment, would have a better prospect of rising than one who takes a commission in the marines. How great is their advantage over us then, when we look to the range which they enjoy of promotion through the whole line of the army, which, even on its present footing, has fourteen colonels; whereas, the marines, being a distinct and separate corps, confined to its own limits, and with more men and subalterns than any regiment in the service, is commanded by an officer of inferior grade, and who is destined never to rise higher than the command of his own corps. Promotion, as the just reward of faithful and meritorious services, is the only inducement the profession of arms can offer to a young man of enterprise and talents, to relinquish the gainful pursuits of civil life. This consideration, added to the hope of acquiring fame and honor, should always be before the eyes of a military man, as a stimulus to distinguished achievements; and while we see a prospect of honorable old age and comfort held out to the army and the navy, we have the melancholy contemplation of a lifetime of devotion to our country for the rank and station of a captain. Small as is our allowance of pay, we do not ask to have it increased; we have no view to pecuniary advantages; we only pray to be made more respectable and more useful; and we beseech you, sir, to look into our situation, and give us your aid in raising the corps in which we serve from its present position.

Can it be known to the government, that the marine corps furnishes a guard for every navy yard in the United States, and that serving in every public vessel that floats, they keep the same watch and do the same drudgery as the seamen? That almost all our captains are nearly of ten years' standing, and that many of the lieutenants are as old in their respective grades?

The greatly superior advantage in point of pay and promotion enjoyed by officers of the navy with whom we are immediately allied, and with whom the most important of our service is performed, is too well known to you, sir, to make any other notice of it necessary, than simply to call your attention to the comparison. We have instances before us of naval officers, who being midshipmen at the time when some of our officers were captains, are now in the rank of masters commandant, while the officers of marines continue to be captains still, and many of the undersigned who were captains and lieutenants, commanding the guards of ships in the late war, on the ocean and on the lakes, remain in the grades they then filled.

The undersigned are proud to revert to the events of that important period in the history of our country. They appeal to the testimony of our most distinguished naval commanders, to prove that the marines assisted with credit in gaining all our naval victories; and the captains of our vessels have borne honorable witness to their merits on those great occasions. We occupy a post of as much danger as any in the ship in time of action; and there is nothing on record wherewith to reproach us. Many of our officers and men have sealed with their blood, on the land and on the ocean, the compact of patriotism and valor, entered into with their country by engaging in her service. The undersigned pray to be reörganized, and constituted to serve as a corps of marine artillery as well as marine infantry, to be drilled to act in either capacity, as occasion may require. They also pray, that the commandant of the corps may be raised to the rank of colonel; for the creation of two majors; and for three additional captains, making the whole number twelve. That the first lieutenants remain as they are, and that the second lieutenants be fixed at twenty.

They would also call your attention to the fact, that the necessities of the service require at least two hundred and fifty men above the number provided for by law; and that this accession to the strength of the corps is now wanting to enable the commandant to furnish the guards required for the protection of the navy yards, and for the ships.

The additional number of captains asked for are not in proportion to this increase of men; and the undersigned refer you to the enclosed statement marked A, showing that all the officers can be usefully and actively employed, and that important commands hereto confided to lieutenants, may in future, under this arrangement, be assigned to officers of rank proper for such responsibility.

The undersigned look forward with great hope to your favorable consideration of this, their respectful representation, and are sanguine of success, with your approbation and support.

18TH CONGRESS.] No. 267. [2D SESSION.

ON THE MEMORIAL OF JOHN M. GAMBLE, A CAPTAIN OF MARINES, FOR COMPENSATION OR PRIZE MONEY FOR CAPTURING AN ENEMY'S VESSEL IN 1813.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE MARCH 2, 1825.

Mr. HAYNE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of John M. Gamble, a captain of marines, in the United States navy, praying compensation for the capture of the Seringapatam, during the late war with Great Britain, reported:

That Captain Gamble, then a lieutenant of marines, was attached to the Essex frigate, during her memorable cruise in the Pacific ocean, and was entrusted, by Commodore Porter, with the command of the Greenwich, one of his prizes; that, whilst thus commanding, he fell in with the Seringapatam, an armed ship of the enemy, of very superior force, which, after a short conflict, he captured. From the papers accompanying the memorial, it may be perceived, that this affair was regarded, at the time, as a very gallant one; but owing to the capture of Commodore Porter's dispatches, no official account of it has ever been published. The committee regret that the prayer of the memorialist cannot properly be granted, there being no precedent of any compensation, further than the prize, ever having been made to the captors of the private armed ships of the enemy.

The committee, however, cannot consent to close their report without expressing their sense of the gallantry, skill, and enterprise, displayed by Captain Gamble, in the capture of the Seringapatam. The committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the memorialist have leave to withdraw his memorial and papers.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The memorial of Brevet Lieutenant Colonel John M. Gamble, of the marine corps, respectfully showeth:

That in the late war with Great Britain your memorialist was appointed to the command of an armed ship in the South seas; and on the 13th of July, 1813, fell in with and, after a contest, (the particulars of which have been furnished the government by Commodore Porter,) captured a ship called the Seringapatam, much superior in force to the Greenwich, the ship your memorialist commanded. That the taking of the Seringapatam was of importance to American citizens engaged in commerce on those seas, inasmuch as she had captured the ship "Edward," from Nantucket, and had aided a Spanish privateer in the capture of two other American south-seamen. That she was, when captured by your memorialist, cruising in search of other American vessels, engaged in their lawful pursuits. That the Seringapatam proved to be a heavy armed ship, fitted out at great expense, and when captured abundantly supplied with naval stores and provisions. That a large quantity of powder and other articles were taken out of this ship for the use of the United States frigate Essex. That her cargo was worth upwards of thirty thousand dollars. That the Seringapatam, after her capture by your memorialist, was taken into the United States service, by Commodore Porter, as an auxiliary to his armed force in the South seas. That she was, in September, 1814, recaptured, on which occasion your memorialist was severely wounded, and put in an open boat at sea. That the day following, your memorialist was attacked by the savages of Nooaheenah, and had, out of eleven men, four killed and one dangerously wounded. And, finally, that your memorialist has not been compensated either for the capture of the Seringapatam or for the property taken out of her for the use of the United States; your memorialist therefore respectfully petitions Congress to allow a reasonable compensation for the Seringapatam, captured by a very inferior force, and recaptured after having been taken into the service of the United States, as will appear by Commodore Porter's journal, page 205. Your memorialist respectfully begs a reference to the accompanying documents, and will, as in duty bound, ever pray.

Our fleet now consisted of six sail of vessels, without including the Georgiana. On board the last captured vessel, I put a sufficient number of men to fight their guns, giving Lieut. McKnight charge of the Atlantic, and for want of sea officers, I put Lieut. Gamble, of the marines, in charge of the Greenwich. I had much confidence in the discretion of this gentleman; and to make up for his want of nautical knowledge, I put two expert seamen with him as mates, one of whom was a good navigator.

Volunteers continued to offer from the captured vessels, and my whole effective force in those seas now consisted of

The Essex	Mounting	46 guns	and 245 men.
The Georgiana	Mounting	16 guns	and 42 men.
The Atlantic	Mounting	6 guns	and 12 men.
The Greenwich	Mounting	10 guns	and 14 men.
The Montezuma	Mounting	2 guns	and 10 men.
The Policy	Mounting	.. guns	and 10 men.
Making in all		80 guns	333 men.

JULY 13, 1813.

At eleven A. M., discovered three sail off Banks' bay, standing on a wind, some distance from each other. I gave chase to the one in the centre; the others, which appeared to be fine large ships, stood on different tacks with a view of eluding us, while the one I was in chase of bore up from us. I felt apprehensive for the safety of my prizes, which were now a great distance astern of us. The in-shore ship tacked to windward of us and stood for them, with a view of cutting them off; but my anxiety was considerably relieved on seeing the Greenwich heave to for the Georgiana to come up, as I was confident it was for the purpose of getting her crew out, as she soon after stood boldly down for the stranger. We were not long in capturing the vessel we were in chase of, which proved to be the English ship Charlton, of ten guns, the captain of which informed me that the ship now to windward was the Seringapatam, of fourteen guns and forty men, commanded by William Stavers, and that the other was the New Zealander, of eight guns.

The Greenwich continued to run down for her, while the Georgiana ran for the Essex. I soon threw a crew on board the Charlton and gave chase. Several broadsides were exchanged between the Greenwich and the Seringapatam, when the latter hauled down her colors, but endeavored to make her escape in a crippled state, having her sails and rigging much cut. The Greenwich kept up the pursuit close on her quarter, &c.

EXTRACT 4; PAGE 205.

As the Seringapatam proved to be a fast sailing ship, and was in every respect calculated for a man-of-war, (and indeed built for one in India, for Tippoo Saib,) I determined to render her as formidable as possible, that in case of any accident happening to the Essex, our cruise might not be entirely broken up. With this view I sent the gunners and carpenters to work on her, and in a few days she was completely equipped, with twenty-two guns mounted on her. I gave her in charge to Mr. Terry, master mate, with directions not to separate from us.

U. S. FRIGATE ESSEX, at sea, July 14, 1813.

SIR: Allow me to return to you my thanks for your handsome conduct in bringing the Seringapatam to action, which greatly facilitated her capture while it prevented the possibility of her escape.

Be assured, sir, that I shall make a suitable representation of the affair to the honorable Secretary of the Navy.

With the greatest respect, your obedient servant,

D. PORTER.

LT. JOHN GAMBLE, commanding the prize ship Greenwich.

U. S. F. ESSEX, off Albemarle Isle, July 15, 1813.

Allow me to congratulate you, my dear fellow, on your splendid victory of yesterday over so superior a force. One of our officers who has been on board your prize says she mounts 16 guns and had more than three times your crew. I most heartily wish I had been on board as your surgeon, to share prize money as well as honor with you, for I am told she is a very valuable ship and well advanced in her cargo of oil. After we had captured the New Zealander and Charlton, and found out from our prisoners that it was that old renegado Stivers you were engaged with, and so far to windward that we could not beat up to your assistance before midnight, Capt. Porter became extremely anxious about you; he chewed as much tobacco and kept his poor spyglass as constantly employed as ever I knew him to.

At one time, when the Seringapatam tacked, Capt. P. became more anxious than ever; fearful you would tack at the same time and receive a raking shot; he exclaimed: "Now, Mr. Gamble, if you'll only stand on five minutes, and then tack, I'll make you a prince." You stood on awhile, when he again exclaimed, "Now is your time;" just then we observed your ship in stays, which gave you the raking shot that did the enemy so much injury. So, my dear fellow, you stand a chance of being princed, knighted, or something else. The captain was much pleased, put the spyglass under his arm, walked aft, and appeared to think all safe. I wanted to have had a talk to you when you were on board the Essex, but we were both too much hurried. Old Stivers is in the steerage with us; we find him a noisy, abusive steerage mate. He talks about everything but what we want to hear. I hope to see you soon, until when adieu.

Sincerely your friend, &c.,

ALEXANDER M. MONTGOMERY.

NAVY COMMISSIONERS' OFFICE, February 10, 1816.

SIR: Captain John Gamble of the marines served with me on the Essex, from the time of my taking command of that vessel, until my departure from Madison's Island; during the whole of which his conduct was such as to entitle him to my respect, as an officer and a gentleman.

During a great part of my cruise in the South seas, Captain (then Lieutenant) Gamble, continued in command of one of my most valuable prizes, and while in that situation, brought to action with an inferior force, and caused to surrender, an armed vessel of the enemy which had long been the terror of the American ships which had been engaged in commercial and other pursuits in that ocean.

Honorable mention was made of this affair to the Secretary of the Navy, but by the capture of the vessel, the account was lost, and of course never reached the United States.

Captain Gamble at all times greatly distinguished himself by his activity in every enterprise engaged in by the force under my command, and in many critical encounters by the natives of Madison Island, rendered essential services, and at all times distinguished himself by his coolness and bravery. I therefore do, with pleasure recommend him to the Department, as an officer deserving of its patronage.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed,) D. PORTER.

NEW YORK, April 5, 1824.

MY DEAR FRIEND: I yesterday received your letter of the 3d instant, on the subject of a claim about to be brought before Congress for your capture of the ship Seringapatam, in the Pacific, in 1813, while in command of the prize ship Greenwich, and am truly pleased to learn that your friends at Washington have advised such a course, and speak favorably of its success.

I shall, with the most perfect willingness, state what I know of the circumstances connected with the affair, though, as I was not a witness or a party to any operations of the commodore's cruise until after meeting you at Madison Island, in October or November, 1813, my statement I should presume can be of little importance.

With regard to the fact of the surrender of the Seringapatam to your ship I should suppose there can be no doubt; having heard it mentioned while at Madison Island, and at other times, as matter of common notoriety, and never hearing it contradicted.

My recollection of the ship itself will not soon be effaced; it being on board her our disasters commenced, in May, 1814, when the crew rose on us, ran away with the ship, &c. Of the value of her lading I have no distinct recollection, the oil having been taken out about the time I joined you; nor do I recollect the force of the ship at the time of her capture. That it was formidable and much dreaded on the cruising ground of the whalers I always understood. One fact relating to the warlike and formidable appearance of the Seringapatam, which came under my observation and within my own knowledge, it may be worth while to state: When the Albatros, on board which ship I arrived at the islands a passenger, came off the harbor, and we saw the fleet anchored inside, all on board supposed that ship to be a frigate.

The particular dimensions of the Seringapatam I do not recollect, but believe her measurement was about 400 tons, but of such construction that she would stow much more. She was certainly a valuable ship, being entirely of teak wood. We understood she was built for and owned by Tippoo Saib for a vessel-of-war, being pierced for guns on her lower deck, how many I do not remember—named after the capital city of his country, and had been taken from him by the English.

I further understood that this ship had been sent from India to England with a view to being purchased by government there.

That there was great merit and much credit due you for capturing the Seringapatam I presume none ever venture to question; and had the termination of the Essex's cruise been different, no doubt some such proceeding as is now commenced would long since have been started. The subject having rested until now, however, is not the less entitled to the attention of Congress, and be assured of my best wishes for the success of your memorial. You are at liberty to make any use of this letter which may be thought proper, or I will most willingly state what I know connected with the subject in any other shape you may desire.

I expect to sail for Canton in about three weeks, but will write you on this subject in a few days.

Meantime I remain most truly your friend and obedient servant,

BEN. CLAPP.

Major JOHN M GAMBLE, Philadelphia.

NEW YORK, April 15, 1824.

MY DEAR SIR: I do myself the pleasure of stating some general facts in relation to the object of your letter, which has just reached me.

The English ship Seringapatam, commanded by Captain Stivers, was deemed by the American whalemen their most formidable enemy in the Pacific ocean. Her size, construction, and armament better adapted her for hostilities than any ship which we found engaged in the whale fishery. It was known she had taken the ship Edward, of Nantucket, and was, when fallen in with, cruising for other American vessels. Her commander was reported to be a bold and unprincipled adventurer, and had he not been arrested in his course, would unquestionably have committed serious depredations on American property in that ocean. In company with two other English ships, the Seringapatam was met at sea by the force under Commodore Porter. The prize ship Greenwich, under your immediate command, acted a distinguished part on the 12th or 13th July, 1813, in capturing the Seringapatam—her physical force was much superior to that of the Greenwich, and to the better discipline and skill of your crew—which was evinced in the engagement between the two ships, the fortunate result of the contest is to be ascribed. Your engagement with the Seringapatam took place while Commodore Porter was occupied in capturing the other ships. Several broadsides had been exchanged between the Greenwich and Seringapatam, when the latter hauled down her colors, endeavoring at the same time to escape by making sail; her crippled condition retarded her progress, and the Greenwech gaining on her in the pursuit, and rendering the success of her attempt impracticable, the enemy, after a few more shot from the Greenwich, surrendered. To you, my dear sir, much credit and even applause were given for the capture of an enemy's ship so notorious as was the Seringapatam.

I would enter into the detailed statement which you request, but after the lapse of ten years, the particulars that at the time presented themselves did not make much impression on the mind of a surgeon, have become indistinct in my memory.

I remain, with much respect, sincerely yours,

RICHARD K. HOFFMAN.

PHILADELPHIA, December 18, 1824.

MY DEAR SIR: It is with much pleasure I hear that you have a prospect of being rewarded by Congress for your skill and gallantry in capturing the English armed ship Seringapatam in 1813. It affords me a satisfaction to have an opportunity of testifying that she was vastly superior to your ship (the Greenwich) in number as well as size of her guns, and about three times as large a crew. The Seringapatam measured over 400 tons, was built of teak, and copper-fastened. At the time you captured her, after a brisk and well conducted chase fight, she mounted 16 long guns on the spar deck; she was pierced for guns on the gun deck, but had none mounted there. Stivers, who commanded the Seringapatam was a daring, unprincipled marauder, who was a constant scourge to our whale fishery in the Pacific, and, although he had no letter of marque or other commission for justification, we know that he had captured one American whaleship, and was cruising for others, when you had the good luck to capture his vessel and put a stop to his piratical pursuits.

While you was engaged with the Seringapatam, we (the Essex) was capturing the whaleships Charlton and New Zealander, and so far to leeward that we could have rendered you no assistance if the Seringapatam had been victorious. The Greenwich was managed throughout the contest in such a way as to draw upon your conduct several very high encomiums from Commodore Porter in my hearing, and the most decided approbation and congratulation of all your countrymen who witnessed it.

With sincere friendship, I remain, your obedient servant,

ALEXANDER MONTGOMERY, U. S. Navy.

Major JOHN M. GAMBLE, U. S. Marines, Philadelphia.

I certify that the foregoing is a true copy of an original letter from Doctor Montgomery which is not at present in my possession.

19TH CONGRESS.] No. 268. [1ST SESSION.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY, WITH THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE, SHOWING THE OPERATIONS OF THAT DEPARTMENT IN 1825.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS WITH THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE OF THE 6TH OF DECEMBER, 1825.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, December 2, 1825.

The Secretary of the Navy respectfully submits to the President of the United States the following statements respecting the concerns of the Navy Department, during the present year.

The vessels in commission, for active service, at sea, have been the same as they were at the close of the last year, with the following exceptions:

The frigate Brandywine, then on the stocks at the navy yard in this place, has been launched and fitted out, and is now a part of the Mediterranean squadron. The schooner Nonsuch has been sold, because she was so far decayed that it was not "for the interest of the United States to repair her." The schooner Ferret was lost, in a gale, on the coast of Cuba, on the 4th February last. The Beagle and Terrier have been sold, under the law of the last session, entitled, "An act to authorize the building of ten sloops of war, and for other purposes." The latter recently arrived at Wilmington, North Carolina, in distress, and was disposed of, at public auction at that place. The proceeds of the sales of the vessels sold have been carried to the fund designated by law. The Decoy is still used, as a storeship, but will be sold on her return to the United States. The Sea Gull has been profitably converted into a receiving vessel at Philadelphia. Some of the barges have become useless, by decay, and the rest are retained on the Florida station.

The Fox, a schooner of fifty-three tons, is the only cruising vessel remaining, of those purchased under the "Act authorizing an additional naval force for the suppression of piracy."

The paper marked A, exhibits the vessels in commission, and the station on which each is employed.

The West India squadron now consists of the frigate Constellation, corvette John Adams, sloop Hornet, brig Spark, schooners Grampus, Shark and Fox, and the storeship Decoy, with the barges. The duties assigned to it have been signally accomplished. Several captures of pirates were made, in the early part of the year, of which the documents annexed furnish an account. See papers marked B. Since that time, the principal places where piracy existed have been diligently watched, and no complaints on the subject have been made, to the knowledge of the Department, for several months past.

Captain Warrington, an active, systematic and enterprising officer, commands in that quarter, and, seconded as he is, by a commendable zeal and skill in his subordinate officers, it is believed that he will continue to repress that evil, which has, heretofore, produced so much anxiety and distress.

There have been thirteen deaths among the officers attached to that squadron, occasioned by diseases, contracted either in the vessels, or in the ports of the West Indies.

Against danger, from this cause, the commanding officer was particularly instructed to be upon his guard, and has, no doubt, been attentive to his orders; but severe exposures are incident to the service, and where so many officers are subjected to them, it must be expected that they will prove fatal to some; especially to those who are not very cautious in guarding their health. We have been, however, so far fortunate, as to suffer less, from this cause, in the present, than the preceding years; arising probably, in part, from a change in the size and character of the vessels employed; and steady attention is paid to the subject, and such arrangements made, as give the best hopes of lessening the evil. Although sickness has prevailed at Thompson's Island to a distressing extent, it has been less severe than heretofore. Two officers have died there, and their deaths are probably not to be attributed solely to the climate.

The station at that place having been found unhealthy, a surrender of the buildings occupied by the War Department, at Pensacola, was obtained for the purpose, and arrangements made, early in the spring, for the removal of the stores, &c., to them. An order for the transfer was issued on the 24th May, to be sent by the Decoy; but an unexpected accident delayed the sailing of that vessel, until the 13th July, and she had an unusually long passage, of between forty and fifty days. The order is annexed, and marked C. The transfer has since been made, and Pensacola is now the rendezvous of the squadron, and will continue so; the site for a navy yard and depot having been selected, at that place, under the act of Congress, entitled, "An act authorizing the establishment of a navy yard and depot on the coast of Florida, in the Gulf of Mexico."

Immediately after the passage of that law, on the 3d March last, measures were taken to obtain such information, not then in the possession of the Department, as was necessary to a safe execution of the power, and this being procured, arrangements were made to send out Captains Bainbridge, Warrington and Biddle, to make the selection of a site.

They sailed from Norfolk on the 13th October, and arrived at Pensacola, after a very short passage, on the 25th; lost no time in completing a full examination of the places which were considered most likely to answer for such an establishment; and have made such a selection as their intelligence and discretion dictated. Their report was received at the Department on the 1st December, and has been transmitted to, and approved by you.

The orders under which they acted, together with their report, are annexed, and marked D.

The experience of the department, and personal observation during the last year, have entirely satisfied me that the greater part, if not the whole, of our navy yards, are badly located; and that a very large proportion of the public money, which has been, and continues to be, expended upon them, might have been saved, by a wiser location at the commencement. A desire to avoid the recurrence of this evil induced me to adopt the mode of selecting a site for the Florida navy yard; a mode in which the best skill would be exercised, in the absence of all private interests and feelings.

Under the law of last year, entitled "An act authorizing an examination of the harbor of Charleston, in South Carolina, of St Mary's, in Georgia, and of the coast of Florida, and for other purposes," surveys have been made of the harbors mentioned, and such examinations and surveys of Pensacola and the coast of Florida procured, as seemed necessary to accomplish the objects of that law. The expediency of establishing a "naval depot" on the Gulf of Mexico, was determined at the last session of Congress, and an appropriation made for the purpose. What has been done by the Department, on that subject, will be seen by the preceding part of this report.

A detailed statement of the surveys of Charleston and St. Mary's, to be accompanied by a chart, is now preparing, by the officers who were employed on that duty, may be communicated in the progress of the session, should it be wished, and will be some guide in forming an opinion "on the expediency of establishing a navy yard at either of those places, for the building and repairing of sloops of war and other vessels of an inferior class."

There are still, perhaps, one or two places on the coast of Georgia and South Carolina, which it would be proper to survey, but the appropriation is expended. These surveys, with others which have, from time to time, been made, under the direction of the Department, have, to a certain extent, been useful, but they have also been very expensive, in proportion to their usefulness. Made under special appropriations, and special acts of Congress, the officers and other means for their execution were to be collected at the time, and all the expense of organizing those means to be encountered at the commencement of every survey, and to be disposed of at its termination. A large part of the appropriations has necessarily been expended for this purpose; and I would respectfully suggest, that a more regular and systematic, and, therefore, economical plan, should be adopted. Our whole coast ought to be surveyed. The acquaintance with it, of our best informed men, both on land and water, is much more superficial than it ought to be. There is scarcely a mile of it which is thoroughly known. Hence our commerce, and the interests of our navy, suffer greatly, even in time of peace, and, in war, are unnecessarily hazarded. The last war exhibited, in many instances, in the enemy, a knowledge on this subject not inferior to that possessed by ourselves. It seems due to the character of the nation, and to the interests of commerce, and of the naval service, that a more systematic and scientific mode of making these surveys should be adopted; that they should extend over the whole coast; and that means, commensurate with the object, should be placed under the control of this or some other Department. A naval school would, in a short time, furnish cheap and valuable means of accomplishing them.

The Mediterranean squadron, at this time, consists of the North Carolina 74, frigates Brandywine, and Constitution, and sloops Ontario, and Erie, and is still under the command of Commodore Rodgers. A slight temporary alarm existed in the course of the summer, respecting its health, resulting from accidental causes, but from communications recently received from Commodore Rodgers, appears to have passed by, and it may be said that its general health during the year has been, and that it now is, as good as is common with our squadron in that sea. Three only of our officers, and very few of the men, have died, and no extensive sickness has prevailed among them.

The general objects of the squadron have continued the same as in former years, but additional importance has been given to its presence, in the eastern part of the Mediterranean, by the nature of the contest between Greece and Turkey, and the inconvenience to our commerce, likely to result from it. Some injuries must necessarily be anticipated, and some have actually been felt, from the unauthorized abuse of the flag of one of the contending parties to the purposes of plunder. The presence of the whole squadron there for a short period, and the continuance of a portion of it for a much longer time, have, no doubt, prevented numerous trespasses upon our rights.

The commanding officer has been directed to yield a suitable protection to our commerce with Smyrna, and other places on the borders of that sea, and will, with his usual correctness and energy, discharge the trust confided to him. The squadron will rendezvous at Mahon for the winter, the Spanish government having granted permission to deposit, there, without charge, the stores necessary for its use. No positive exertion of force has been required to maintain our rights, nor has any incident, calling for particular mention, occurred, in preserving the discipline and health of the squadron. The whole is now in a state which merits approbation.

The Cyane lately returned from that station, and is about to perform a short cruise on the coast of South America, bordering on the Atlantic, having in view the general interests of our commerce, and a communication with the public agents of the government in that quarter. She is commanded by Captain Elliot.

The schooner Porpoise will sail in a few days, to join the squadron, and will carry orders for the frigate Brandywine to return to the United States, with a view to prepare her for a cruise in the Pacific, to relieve the frigate United States, in the course of the coming summer. It would, probably, be better not to lessen the force now in the Mediterranean, but it cannot be avoided, unless such an appropriation should be made as to enable the Department to put another frigate or ship of the line in commission.

Our naval force in the Pacific still consists of the frigate United States, the sloop of war Peacock, and the schooner Dolphin, under the command of Captain Hull. Our commerce, in that ocean, having suffered severely from the war between Spain and South America, being alternately the prey of those who used the flag of both parties, a determination was formed to recommend such an increase of our force as would be sufficient to command respect, and security for our interests, on every part of the extensive coasts of Chili and Peru, and enable the commanding officer, occasionally, to send a vessel to cruise along the coast of Mexico, California, and to the mouth of the Columbia river. But this addition is not considered indispensably necessary at this time. The war in Chili and Peru is nearly closed, and there is no Spanish naval force on the water. This state of things has relieved entirely from the depredations of one party, and taken from the other all those excuses which are usually found under the claim of belligerent rights. Our interests and commerce are, therefore, comparatively safe, and do not require a large augmentation of force to protect them. Papers, marked F, are copies of letters from Commodore Isaac Hull.

It is nevertheless thought proper to add one vessel, a sloop of war, to the squadron; and when the extent of the coast, and the islands and ocean, and the variety and magnitude of our commerce upon them, is considered, no hesitation is felt in assuming it as a fact, that our interests require at least four vessels for their protection, even in a state of peace between all the powers, whose rights and commerce extend to that portion of the globe. It is proposed, therefore, in the course of the ensuing summer, to send another sloop of war to the Pacific, and also to relieve the frigate United States by a vessel of the same class.

Orders were given, on the 24th May last, to Commodore Hull, to visit, at a convenient and proper time, the Society and Sandwich Islands, for the purpose of looking to the interests of our navigators, and to endeavor to relieve some of the latter islands from a number of American seamen, who, having deserted, have given great annoyance both to our vessels and to the inhabitants. It is hoped he will be able to make that visit before he returns to the United States, and that it will have a salutary effect.

The distance to our squadron in the Pacific, and the length and uncertainty of the passages around Cape Horn, render it extremely inconvenient to make the necessary communications between the Department and the commanding officer. In some instances, within the last two or three years, it has been found necessary to send special messengers for the purpose. It is believed that a regular line of communication, through Panama and the Isthmus, may be established at small expense, so as to furnish a periodical conveyance in both directions, as often as once in four or six weeks. It is wished by the Department to have such a plan in operation in the course of the ensuing spring. Should the wish be gratified, great benefit will result to the public service, and the effect on the mercantile interests of the country may be estimated by those who best understand the extent of our commerce in the Pacific, and the difficulty of corresponding with commercial agents there Inconveniencies having been, heretofore, felt, in the fisheries to the north, particularly in the Bay of Fundy, and on the coast of Newfoundland, it was thought that the presence of a public vessel might be useful there. The schooner Porpoise, under the command of Master Commandant Parker, was, therefore, sent, early in June; and, after making an examination, throughout the line of fisheries, as far north as 55 deg. 9 min. of latitude, returned to New York October 25. The reports of Captain Parker have been satisfactory, and the cruise beneficial. The only injury to our fishermen, of which information was received, was, that a small number of them had been, in the early part of the season, and before the arrival of the Porpoise, ordered away from Higurath Bay, by the French, who claim a right to the use of that bay, exclusive of all other nations; a right to which our government has not assented.

It is proposed that a similar cruise be made during the fishing season of the next year.

Due attention has been paid to the agency for recaptured Africans, and vessels, from time to time, sent to it, and to accomplish the objects of the laws for the suppression of the slave trade No information has been received of our flag being used in that trade, although it continues to exist, and it is to be feared that some of our citizens are engaged in it. The situation of the agency has not been materially changed since the last communication respecting it.

The expenditures during the year, so far as yet known, are $12,900.31, and it will be necessary to make an additional appropriation for its support, in the course of the present session. The number of Africans sent to it will be greatly increased in the next three or four months. A decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the General Ramirez, placed under the control of the government from 125 to 130, who were brought into Georgia, and arrangements are making to send them to the agency.

The paper G shows the naval officers who have died since the 1st December, 1824. It contains the names of some of the most promising, active, and meritorious, at the head of whom is that of Commodore M'Donough. His loss is to be deeply deplored, both on account of the splendid services he has performed, and the useful example of private and public worth which he exhibited to his brother officers.

Paper H shows the resignations during the present year.

Paper I is a report of the expenditures for the naval service during the year.

The estimates for the ordinary service of the ensuing year will be found in papers marked K.

Should any, or all of the objects recommended in this report find favor with Congress, additional appropriations, to a small amount, will be required. The form of the estimates is the same as that of last year, both being dictated by the understanding which the Department has of the wishes of Congress on the subject. The reasons for any change which exists in the amount of any of the items, will be found in this report.

One of the most serious inconveniences under which the Department labors in the administration of the concerns of the navy, is the time at which the appropriation bills are passed by Congress. They are passed, in the short session, late in February, and, in the long session, generally in May, so that, during a period of from one-fourth to a third of the year, the Department is left with funds previously appropriated, and must, of necessity, permit expenditures not yet legally authorized. Another evil results: It is the will of Congress often to change the wording and character of the appropriation, and, after the bill is passed, it is a mouth or six weeks before the instructions under the new appropriation can be given to and acted upon by the agents. It consequently follows, that, for nearly one-half of the year, the Department acts in perfect ignorance of the law under which it is bound to act. Expenditures are made, under one form, when they ought to have been made under another. The law is, necessarily, not complied with, because it is passed after the act is performed. Infinite confusion is created in settling the accounts, and it is impossible for any talent or any industry ever to have them rendered and settled, in that plain and simple manner in which they ought always to be exhibited, and in which they must be exhibited if any efficient control is to be had by Congress or the Department, over that branch of the service. The accounting officers do all that capacity and labor can accomplish, but they cannot settle an account according to the forms of a law not yet in existence; nor can they, every year, alter the items, open new books, meet the errors resulting from this cause, in accounts transmitted from a distance, and yet settle the accounts of the year within the year. A remedy might be found in two circumstances:

1st. An earlier passage of the appropriation bill, or by making the year end on the 1st April, and always passing the bills before that day. If the latter mode be taken, the first appropriation should be for fifteen or eighteen months.

2d. By reducing the number of heads, under which the appropriation for the service is made, and continuing those heads permanently.

It would be more practicable, under this arrangement, than it now is, to make the investigation and preserve a rigid accountability.

The appropriation, so far as the contingent is concerned, has been, within the two last years, changed, and the sum appropriated, ordered to be expended only on the contingencies of the year in which the bills were passed.

Two difficulties have arisen, which it is my duty to mention:

1st. Much of the year had expired before the law was passed, and the agents and pursers informed of it; they, of course, had, until that time, paid the money and transmitted the accounts, under the old forms. An effort has been made to correct this unavoidable error, and to settle the accounts by the principle laid down in the law, but it has proved very ineffectual. It is next to impossible to retrace the items, and place them under their proper heads; and, where money has been paid, on debts really due by the government, for the preceding years, it could not be recovered.

In the second place, many of our officers are on foreign stations, and at such a distance from the seat of government that their claims in preceding years could not be transmitted for settlement, until after the passage of the existing law, and therefore, when presented, payment was denied to them. The Department had no right to use the appropriation for the satisfaction of any claims which originated before the beginning of the year.

Yet the claims were just; the government owed the money; the debt was honestly and fairly contracted under the law, as existing and known to the Department and officer. The effect on the service, and the individual, has been severely felt.

Another difficulty which has been encountered, and to which legislative attention will, no doubt, be directed at no distant period, is that of procuring and enlisting seamen. Our vessels are sometimes detained by it an inconvenient length of time, occasioning much additional expense, and depriving us of their active service at sea. The higher wages, and stronger inducements, held out by the merchant service, and the temptations presented by other governments, are the active causes which produce this state of things, at this time.

The Department has endeavored to escape the evil by such arrangements, as, being within its power, promised to have most effect. Among them, is that of placing, at each of the principal recruiting stations, a vessel not calculated for the sea, but fitted up with the same comfort, and officered and governed in the same way as if in actual commission, to which the recruit can be sent, and there kept, until he can be transferred to the vessel in which he is to sail. One or two have already been prepared for the purpose, and others will be, without delay. This arrangement is still matter of experiment, and the effect may not prove beneficial. The benefits promised are, that the seamen, assured of immediate comfort, will more readily enlist; their health will be promoted, and the diseases contracted on shore removed; they will be disciplined and trained, so as to be, at once, useful; fewer desertions will take place; they can be employed in the yards, should circumstances call for it; and our vessels, when they arrive, and discharge those whose service has expired, be again manned, without delay. But the arrangements of the Department, however useful, must be comparatively inefficient to remove the evils suggested. The remedy rests with the power which can establish permanent regulations, which will tend both to increase the number of seamen, and bind them more permanently to our public service. This object will be found, in the progress of our naval history, to be of high importance. Our naval power, in all other respects, has its limits only in the will of the nation. Our free institutions interpose a barrier to a compulsory augmentation of the number of our seamen, and a system must be devised which will ensure voluntary enlistments sufficient to meet our increasing wants. Two of the features of this system will probably be, to admit more boys, in the character of apprentices, and enlist robust and healthy landsmen, in the interior, who will soon acquire the habits and skill of seamen, and form a most valuable portion of our force.

Other difficulties have arisen, from the present disposition of the building arrangements at our yards. They have, heretofore, been improved by temporary expedients, and the buildings erected and arranged with reference only to existing necessities, and without regard to the future and growing wants of our navy. Many and serious evils have resulted; much public money has been unnecessarily expended; many losses sustained by the change, removal, and alteration of the several erections; timber exposed to decay; stores requiring immense labor to deposit and preserve them; a much larger number of hands required to perform the work; unpleasant, and sometimes injurious delays in fitting out our vessels. It is a mortifying fact, yet there is no doubt of its truth, that one-third of the money expended at our yards, has been lost from this cause. The remedy is manifest, and it is earnestly hoped that means may be provided to apply it. A commission of prudent and intelligent officers should be selected, to examine minutely and carefully all our navy yards, and to make a plan for each, suited to its location, and the future wants of the service at it; prescribing the buildings which will be required, and the location and character of each building, together with such improvements in the ground and form of the yard as will be most beneficial. This plan, after being submitted to the Department, and amended if necessary, and approved, should be the guide in all future expenditures. The expense of making such a plan, and erecting the buildings necessary to execute it, would cost a large sum of money, and increase the present expense of our naval establishment; but the future saving to the nation, by adopting and pursuing it rigidly, may be counted by hundreds of thousands, perhaps by millions of dollars; and the promptitude which would be created by it in all our works, and especially in the fitting out of our vessels, be felt in the efficiency of every part of the service. A board of officers could form such a plan, to be submitted to the Department in the course of one season, and would be established; but it will demand some expenditure of money, and the present form of the appropriation forbids it; and, as it must be completed by legislative aid, it is now proposed to you, in the performance of my duty, that if approved, it may be adopted.

An allowance book for all the wants of each vessel of the several classes, has been prepared with great care, by the Board of Navy Commissioners, and approved by the Department; a copy of which will be sent to each of the yards, and be the invariable guide in preparing our vessels for sea. If to this were added, a proper arrangemant of the buildings, materials, and stores, in the yard, a very small portion of the time now spent in port, would be required, and our vessels be able to render much more service at sea. Statement, marked E, in paper K, shows the progress made under the law for the gradual increase of the navy.

The annexed letter to the Commissioners of the Navy, marked L, and their report, marked F, in paper K, will show the progress that has been made in executing the law, passed on the 3d March last, "to authorize the building of ten sloops of war, and for other purposes." It will be perceived, that orders were issued to the respective commandants at Portsmouth, Philadelphia, Washington, and Gosport, for the construction of one sloop of war at each of the yards under their command; and, also, to the commandants at Charlestown and Brooklyn, to make arrangements to commence, immediately, the construction of three sloops of war at each of those yards. Three of the ten sloops will be launched within the present year, two at Charlestown, and one at Brooklyn, one of those at Charlestown will be ready for sea before the first January next.

Contracts for the timber and other materials, for all the sloops authorized by law, have been made upon terms favorable to the government, to be delivered at the several places of building, within the ensuing year: in which time, it is believed, the entire number may be afloat, should Congress think proper to make the appropriation for that purpose. It will be recollected that the estimate for building these vessels was $850,000, and that $500,000 only were appropriated by the law authorizing their construction. The remaining $350,000 will be necessary before they can be completed. The Department was urged to build some of these vessels by contract, with a view to occasion a portion of the expenditure at places other than our navy yards. But as all the expenditures of the Department, except the expenses of building, are made by public contract, and thus equally open to all parts of the Union, this consideration was believed to be of inferior moment, and other reasons seemed to render it both inexpedient and illegal. If built anywhere but in our public yards, it must have been by contract, or by the establishment of temporary yards. Building by contract has been abandoned, as inexpedient and expensive, for many years past, and ought not to be resumed but by the express direction of Congress. This direction has been, more than once, attempted, and always refused, thus indicating strongly the legislative opinion on the subject. The law itself, is in the same form as that for the gradual increase of the navy, and it was, therefore, to be presumed, that Congress meant it to be executed in the same mode. In addition to which, the appropriation was for a part only of the cost: and if contracts for completing the whole, had been made, a refusal by Congress to provide the means, at the time required by the contracts, would have created serious inconvenience to both parties.

The other mode, of establishing temporary yards for the purpose, collecting officers, materials, and machinery, and disposing of them when the work was completed, was surrounded by so many objections, both as to convenience and economy, as permitted no hesitation in rejecting it. It was not doubted, therefore, that the proper execution of the law required that the contracts for materials should be made in the usual mode, and the building be done at our public yards.

Under the authority given by the second section of this law, sale has been made of the whole of the public vessels upon Lakes Erie, Ontario, and Champlain, except the ships of the line New Orleans and Chippewa, at Sackett's Harbor, and the schooner Ghent at Erie. Almost the whole of the public property at those places has also been sold or ordered to be transported to the navy yards on the Atlantic, and the stations will be broken up as soon as those orders can be executed, leaving only an officer and one or two men at each, to look after such property as it may be found impossible or inexpedient to remove. For the expense attending these operations, no appropriation was made during the last session of Congress, the estimates having been presented before the law for the sale of the vessels on the lakes was passed, or the direction given for the removal of the stores. It has therefore diminished the contingent fund to an unexpected extent, and created a necessity for an addition to the appropriation of the present year. It is, however, a temporary expense, and less than is required for the support of those stations, and will avoid the necessity of making estimates for them, after the present year, saving annually about $25,000. (See statement H in paper marked K.)

In this first annual report to you, I would respectfully call your attention to the wants of the service, in relation to discipline, efficiency, and economy. These matters have been presented and urged by me in reports to your predecessor and to Congress. To repeat my views on them would be superfluous; I therefore respectfully refer you to the reports, particularly those which are dated 24th January, 1824, and 1st January, 1825.

Without an organization of some kind, without a revision of our penal code, and of our rules and regulations, and without a naval school, tardy amendments may be made in the naval service, and in its administration, but it is in vain to hope for speedy, useful, and very practical changes. The power of the Department is unequal to such objects. Even the exercise of the power properly belonging to it, without legislative aid in other respects, would produce unpleasant excitement and complaints. With the aid which has been heretofore earnestly entreated from Congress, it is confidently believed that a system more prompt, more efficient, and more economical, could readily be introduced.

The experience of the present year has confirmed, most strongly, the views taken on all the subjects mentioned in the reports to which I refer you.

Very respectfully, &c., SAM. L. SOUTHARD.

THOMPSON'S ISLAND, February 15, 1825.

SIR: I regret very much that my first official report should be of an unpleasant nature.

The United States schooner Ferret, commanded by Lieutenant Charles H. Bell, was unfortunately lost on the coast of Cuba, between Matanzas and Havana, on the afternoon of the 4th inst.

The letter of her commander, (which will be communicated to you by Commodore Porter,) giving a clear and concise account of this untoward occurrence, renders it unnecessary for me to add anything on the subject.

I am greatly pleased to find the loss of human life is but small, and unmarked by the death of any officer, although the crew were twenty hours on the wreck in a high sea, without food or water. Five sailors only, (whose names are mentioned in the list accompanying Lieutenant Bell's letter,) were drowned. The active exertions of Lieutenant Commandant M'Keever of the Sea Gull, and of acting Sailing Master Porter, (who had been dispatched in a small vessel to Cuba,) rescued the remainder from impending death, when hope was nearly destroyed.

I am, with great respect, your obedient servant, L. WARRINGTON.

Hon. SAMUEL SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy.

U. S. STEAM GALLIOT SEA GULL, Matanzas, March 10, 1825.

SIR: Since the departure of the John Adams, nothing material has occurred on this station. No piracies have been committed for several months past, nor have we the least intelligence that should induce us to believe there are any preparations making at the present moment, for their commission. The Sea Gull was sent up to the eastward a few days since, with orders to search a particular part of the coast very carefully, which duty she performed, and returned without seeing or hearing anything that could excite suspicion.

The presence of one or more of the small vessels constantly at and off this harbor, is, however, the cause of their inactivity.

I am fearful that the barge commanded by Lieutenant Pearson of the John Adams, which was missing at the time that ship sailed, is lost; as we have not heard of her, since the 10th of February.

The following is the present distribution of the squadron:

The Hornet, Captain Kennedy, cruising on the south side of this island.

The Porpoise, Lieutenant Commandant Skinner, cruising in the Gulf of Mexico.

The Grampus, Lieutenant Commandant Sloat, cruising off the Island of St. Thomas.

The Sea Gull, Lieutenant Commandant McKeever, and Terrier, Lieutenant Paine, stationed off this place for the protection of the commerce of this port.

The Shark, Lieutenant Commandant Gallagher, stationed at Havana for the same purpose.

The Decoy, Lieutenant Commandant Mix, at Thompson's Island awaiting orders.

I am, very respectfully, &c.

L. WARRINGTON.

U. S. SCHOONER GRAMPUS, St. Thomas, March 12, 1825.

SIR: I have the honor to report, for the information of the Department, that, having learned that several vessels had been robbed by pirates, near Faxardo, and that two sloops of this place, and one of Santa Cruz, had been taken by them, and two of them were equipped and cruising as pirates, I obtained two small sloops at this place, free of expense, by the very cordial co-operation of his excellency Governor Von Sholtens, of St. Thomas, who promptly ordered the necessary documents to be issued, and imposed a temporary embargo, to prevent the transmission of intelligence to the pirates, which sloops I manned and armed, under the command of Lieutenants Pendergrast and Wilson, for the purpose of examining all the small harbors of Crab Island, and the south coast of Porto Rico. We sailed on the first of March, and examined every place as far to the westward as Ponce, without success, although we got frequent information of them. We anchored at Ponce on the evening of the 3d, and took our men and officers on board; the next morning at 10 o'clock a sloop was seen off the harbor, beating to the eastward, which was very confidently supposed to be one of those fitted out by the pirates. I again got one of the sloops and manned her, under the command of Lieutenant Pendergarst, accompanied by Acting Lieutenant Magruder, Doctor Biddle, and Midshipman Stones, with twenty-three men, who sailed in pursuit. The next day, at 3 o'clock, they had the good fortune to fall in with her in the harbor of "Boca del Inferno," which is very large, and has many hiding places, where an action commenced that lasted forty-five minutes, when the pirates ran their sloop on shore and jumped overboard; two of them were found killed, and ten of those which escaped to the shore were taken by the Spanish soldiers, five or six of whom were wounded, and amongst them the famous piratical chief Cofrecinas, who has long been the terror of the coast, and the rallying point of the pirates in this vicinity. As near as we can ascertain, he had fifteen or sixteen men on board, and was armed with one four-pounder, and muskets, pistols, cutlasses, and knives, for his men.

The sloop was got off, and arrived safe with our tender at this place last evening, and I am happy to add, that none of our people received any injury, and all have returned in good health, notwithstanding their exposure to the sun and rain for eleven days, without the possibility of getting below. I have much pleasure in stating to you, that I received every assistance from the authorities of Ponce, whilst there, and that they showed every desire to promote the success of the expedition. I have the honor to enclose you a copy of a letter sent by them to Lieutenant Pendergrast, thanking him, and the other officers and men, for the service rendered the country in the capture of the pirate.

The success of the enterprise, against skillful and cunning adversaries, is the best proof I can offer you of the good conduct of the officers and men engaged in it, and renders superfluous any eulogium from me.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN D. SLOAT.

To the Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

To Lieutenant Pendergrast, the officers and crew of the sloop Dolphin, now in the service of the U. S. of America:

The alcade of Ponce, Don Jose Torres, and the military commandant, Colonel Don Tomas Renovales, request me to say to you, that, in the name of the governor of this island, and of the Spanish nation, they present you their thanks for the important service you have rendered them in capturing the piratical vessel commanded by the noted Cofrecinas.

They have written to the chief authority an account of your gallant and successful expedition, and hope your future exertions may meet with equal success.

In them you will always find friends and brother officers in an honorable cause, and all the assistance they may have in their power.

They request you to accept the refreshments now sent off, and regret that your short stay deprives them of the pleasure of showing you more particular attention. They are also happy to say that Captain Manuel Marcam has also been successful in securing some of the pirates who swam to the shore after you captured their vessel.

Wishing you success, health, &c., I am, gentlemen, your friend and servant,

JAMES J. ATKINSON.

PONCE, March 6, 1825.

UNITED STATES SCHOONER GRAMPUS, St. Thomas, March 19, 1825.

SIR: On the 12th of this month, I had the honor to report the capture of a piratical vessel on the south side of Porto Rico, by an expedition fitted out from this vessel, and her safe arrival at this place; also, my having given her over to the governor, to be returned to her former owner, an inhabitant of St. Thomas. I subsequently learned, that the pirates who swam on shore had been taken and sent to the city of St. John's, the seat of government of Porto Rico, at which place I called to offer our testimony against them. Enclosure No. 1 is my letter to the captain general. No. 2 his reply, which I have forwarded for the information of the Department. Our testimony was not required, as they have confessed sufficient to convict them.

The capture of this vessel, I find, is considered of much more importance, by the governments of Porto Rico, St. Croix, and St. Thomas, than I had any idea of, as the leader, Cofrecinas, has for years been the terror of this vicinity, and his career has been marked by the most horrible murders and piracies; and, for some time, a large reward has been offered by the government of Porto Rico for his head. Although wounded when he got on shore, he would not surrender until he received the contents of a blunderbuss, which shattered his left arm, and he was brought to the ground with the but of it.

I have seen him in prison, and he declares that he has not robbed any American vessel for the last eighteen months, only, however, for want of an opportunity. Several persons on shore, heretofore considered respectable, have been arrested as accomplices of the gang. Six of them were brought to St. John's and committed to prison whilst I was there. The captain general has promised me that these desperadoes shall have summary justice; that he will not wait for the civil court, but will order a court-martial immediately, to try them.

I have great pleasure in stating to you, that the captain general appears to have every disposition to prevent all piracies from the coast of Porto Rico, and to co-operate with me by all the means in his power; and for which purpose he gave me a circular letter to all civil and military officers on the coast, requiring them to give me every assistance and information in their power, whenever the Grampus or her boats may make their appearance on the coast, or in any of the harbors of the island; a copy of which is enclosed, No. 3.

I have also the honor to enclose you a note from me to the Governor (Von Sholton,) of St. Thomas, No. 4, requesting him to give the necessary orders to receive the sloop, and to have her restored to her original owner, and his reply, No. 5. Also, a letter from J. J. Atkinson, Esq., in behalf of the alcalde and military commandant of Ponce, No. 6. When I left St. John's, the fiscal was taking the declaration of Cofrecinas, and the captain general promised me a copy of it, but having a large convoy to take to sea on Sunday (to-morrow) from this place, I could not wait for it; it will be sent to me in a few days, when I shall send it to you for the information of the government, as I have no doubt it will throw much light on the subject of piracies.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN D. SLOAT.

U. S. SCHOONER GRAMPUS, St. John's, Porto Rico, March 14, 1825.

SIR: I have the honor to imform your excellency that I have arrived in this harbor with the U. S. schooner Grampus, under my command; the object of my visit, at this time, is to inform your excellency that a small sloop, a tender to this vessel, met with a piratical sloop in the harbor of "Boca del Inferno," under the command of the famous piratical chief Cofrecinas, on the 5th day of the present month, and, after a desperate resistance, drove her on shore; the pirates that were not killed jumped overboard, and got on shore, where ten of them, I understand, have been taken by the troops in that vicinity, and sent to this place. Should your excellency consider the testimony of the officers of the Grampus at all necessary in bringing those enemies of mankind to justice, it will be cheerfully afforded. The sloop I took to St. Thomas, and gave her to her former owner.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest respect, your excellency's most obed't serv't,

JOHN D. SLOAT.

GOVERNMENT AND CAPTAIN GENERALSHIP OF THE ISLAND OF PORTO RICO,
PUERTO RICO, March 17, 1825.

I have received the official letter which you were pleased to direct to me, under date of 14th ult., informing me of the object of your visit to this port, and offering, if necessary, the declarations of your officers and crew (who fought with so much bravery against the pirates in the "Boca del Inferno,") in case they should be found necessary for the conviction of these criminals, in the process instituted against them by this captain generalship. I return you my most grateful thanks, as well for this offer, as for the effectual assistance you have rendered in the pursuit and capture of these wicked wretches, of which good service I was already informed, by the military commandant and other authorities of Ponce. Be pleased to accept the tender of my acknowledgments, and also be the organ of communicating them to the officers and crew of the schooner under your command, for their co-operation, which confers so much honor on the navy of the United States; and as regards their declaration, (considering that the pirates do not deny the principal facts, and that they have already convicted themselves,) I do not think it necessary to put them to the inconvenience you were pleased to offer, and which goodness would have been accepted, had it been found necessary. This captain generalship, in renewing to you its acknowledgments, flatters itself that you will be pleased to continue your good services in the pursuit of this scourge of humanity, that, in case there should still be any remaining, they may be brought to suffer the condign punishment which their captured comrades will not fail to receive. To effect this the most energetic orders have been issued, that all the authorities of the coast should hold themselves unanimously in readiness to co-operate with you, in the most efficacious manner, for the attainment of this result. Accept, Senor Commandant, the assurance of my respect, and of the consideration with which I pray God to preserve you many years.

MIGUEL DE LA TORRES.

PUERTO RICO, March 16, 1825.

The captain of the U. S. American shooner Grampus, (Lieut. John D. Sloat,) goes in pursuit of pirates, for which purpose he will visit all the ports, harbors, roads, and anchorages, which he may find convenient; in consequence, you will give him all the necessary aid and notice for discovering them, and in case of meeting with them, the authorities of the coast, both civil and military, will join themselves unanimously with the said commandant to pursue them by land while he does the same by sea; and in case any of these wicked wretches should seek refuge in the territory of any part of the island, they will pursue them briskly until they have possessed themselves of their persons. The government expects, from the known zeal of the authorities referred to, that they will display the greatest activity, efficacy, and energy, in this important service, assuring each in particular of the lively interest which it feels for the total extermination of such vile rabble, the disgrace of humanity. Those who shall distinguish themselves, in the opinion of the government, will be reported to his Majesty, giving to each one justice, according to his merits.

God guard you many years.

MIGUEL DE LA TORRES.

To the MILITARY COMMANDANTS OF THE QUARTERS, ROYAL ALCALDES, and other civil and military authorities and functionaries of the coast of this Island.

(No. 4.)

U. S. SCHOONER GRAMPUS, St. Thomas, March 12, 1825.—8 A. M.

SIR: Having been informed by the captain of a vessel that arrived in this port, that the piratical vessel which the Danish man-of-war and myself had for some time been in search of, was in the vicinity of Crab Island, and had captured and plundered several small vessels belonging to this place, and no Danish man-of-war being at the moment in port, I did not hesitate to request of your excellency permission for the three Danish sloops, (whose captains had volunteered their services) to assist me in pursuit of her. Your excellency immediately granted the request, on the sole condition that I should pledge myself as an officer and gentleman that the vessels should not be used for any other purpose than searching for pirates. I can assure your excellency that they have been used by me for no other; the sloop which arrived this morning is the last of the three which were under the command of Lieutenant Pendergrast, who was so fortunate as to fall in with, and capture the piratical vessel we have been so long in search of, commanded by the famous chief Cofrecinas, who is badly wounded: the most of his crew were killed or wounded, and the survivors are all, I believe, now prisoners in Porto Rico, where the government afforded every assistance to the expedition whilst on that coast, and in capturing those that swam on shore. I herewith return your excellency the documents placed by you in my hands, to be used by the sloops engaged in the expedition. I cannot forbear to recommend to your excellency, Captain Perrelty, master and owner of the Danish sloop Dolphin, who rendered great assistance by his knowledge of the coast, and his good conduct during the cruise, and whom I beg leave to recommend to your particular notice.

I have great pleasure in restoring to the rightful owner the sloop captured from the pirates, and request your excellency to give the necessary orders to have her delivered to him. I also enclose several sets of Danish papers, taken on board the piratical vessel.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect,

Your excellency's most obedient servant,

JOHN D. SLOAT.

To his excellency Governor VON SCHOLTEN, of St. Thomas, St. John's, &c., &c.

(No. 5.)

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, St. Thomas, March 12, 1825.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this instant, and am extremely happy at the successful result of the expedition.

I shall take a pleasure to lay your communication before my government, and beg you will be assured how much the community, and I, feel obliged to you for the assistance you, on every occasion, so readily afford this island.

I have the honor to remain, sir, your most obedient servant,

P. SCHOLTEN.

To Lieutenant Commandant, SLOAT, commanding the U. S. Schooner Grampus.

(No. 6.)

PONCE, March 12, 1825.

DEAR SIR: I have the pleasure of communicating to you the agreeable information (at the request of Colonel Renovals) that the chief of the pirate you saw passing in front of the port, and in pursuit of whom you despatched the expeditions, under the command of Lieutenant Pendergrast, has been captured, with twelve of his associates, on shore, near Guayama, all desperately, if not mortally wounded, particularly the leader, Cofrecinas; who landed wounded, and then fought Captain Marcanos until he had three bullet and two sabre wounds; he cannot survive.

The commandant and alcalde present you their sincere and warm thanks for the service and aid you have rendered this place in capturing this pirate, and wish to be remembered to yourself, Lieutenant Pendergrast, and the other officers of your expedition. They wish soon again to see you, and hope you will remain in port long enough for them to show you some particular attention.

Your friend and servant,

JAMES J. ATKINSON.

Captain J. D. SLOAT, of the U. S. Navy.

Many of Cofrecinas' confederates on shore are arrested; five from here sent to St. John's.

U. S. SCHOONER SHARK, Thompson's Island, April 3, 1825.

The enclosed report from Lieutenant Commandant Isaac McKeever, of the U. S. steam galliot Sea Gull, which I have the honor to transmit, gives an account of the successful result of an expedition on which I had sent that vessel, with the barge Gallinipper, on the 20th ult.

On the 21st ult., Lieutenant McKeever fell in with a party sent by Captain Maude, of H. B. M. frigate Dartmouth, for a similar purpose, and having made an arrangement to act in concert, they, thus united, proceeded to the accomplishment of their object, viz., the capture or destruction of a piratical schooner and boat, which I had been confidently informed had committed a piracy but a short time before, and was then equipping for another cruise.

Although the schooner, when captured, had on board a paper professing to be a license for her as a cruiser on the coast, yet, from the want of the captain general of Cuba's signature, or that of the general of marine, to this document, her complete state of preparation for action, the training of her guns on the boats as they approached, the abortive attempts to fire on them, several times repeated, the actual commencement of a fire of musketry, and the quantity of American property found on board and in their lurking places on shore, with the erasure of all the marks by which either its owners or the vessels in which it had been embarked, could be ascertained, I have not the least doubt of her piratical character.

The vessel, and a boat which was the next day captured (all the crew of which escaped on shore), were on the 30th ult. lost in a violent squall on the beach. I have directed the prisoners to be sent to Havana, there to be delivered up to his excellency the captain general, with all the papers which were found, and a succinct account of the circumstances attending the capture.

Before closing this, I must be allowed to express the great satisfaction I feel at the destruction of these vessels, and the capture of so many persons prepared to prey upon the commerce and sport with the lives of our unprotected fellow countrymen engaged in the pursuit of a lawful and peaceable occupation.

To Lieutenant McKeever, and the officers and crew of the Sea Gull, great credit is due for their constant and unremitted exertions, in defiance of fatigue and hunger. The ability of the first named officer has been conspicuously displayed on this occasion, and we are under no small obligations to Lieutenant Ward, the officers and men of H. B. M. ship Dartmouth, for their efficient co-operation, and their strenuous endeavors to effect our common object.

Nineteen prisoners have been brought in, of whom six are wounded. Eight or ten were killed, and the remainder escaped to the shore, where they effectually concealed themselves from pursuit.

I am, with very great respect, your obedient and very humble servant,

L. WARRINGTON.

U. S. STEAM GALLIOT SEA GULL, Thompson's Island, April 1, 1825.

SIR: I have the honor to give you a detailed account of the late cruise on which I sailed from Matanzas, immediately after the reception of your orders of the 19th ultimo, taking with me the barge Gallinipper.

At Stone Key, I met H. B. M. ship Dartmouth, under the command of the Hon. Captain Maude, and was informed by him that some of his boats were then cruising to windward, in company with his B. M. schooners Union and Lion; continued our course, and fell in with them the next evening at Cadiz Bay.

As they were also in search of pirates, but without any particular or certain information of their haunts, of which I was possessed, I deemed it proper to propose a co-operation; it being perfectly understood that I was to have the conducting of the enterprise. This proposition was cheerfully acceded to, and requesting that the schooners should not leave Cadiz Bay to go to windward within three days, I left the Sea Gull under charge of Lieutenant Rudd, and took with me, independent of the barge, which was well manned, two small cutters, with five men in each, and, in company with a British barge and two cutters, under charge of Lieutenant Ward, of the Dartmouth, we made the westernmost point of the entrance of Sagua la Grande, where we were detained forty-eight hours in consequence of strong head winds. The day after we arrived there, our water being nearly expended, the British barge, and Gallinipper, Lieutenant Cunningham, sailed in quest of some, although it was blowing a heavy gale from the eastward, and on the evening of the same day, the Gallinipper was capsized in a squall, but, with the assistance of Lieutenant Ward and his crew, our officers and men were saved, and the vessel righted; she rejoined me, with the intelligence of the accident, a few hours after it happened, having lost part of her arms, ammunition and provisions.

Notwithstanding this very serious misfortune, after pledging myself to procure provisions, we determined not to abandon the pursuit of our object, but upon the very last extremity; accordingly, the next morning (the 25th ult.), the wind abating, we made another effort, and gained the mouth of the river Sagua la Grande about noon; at this place I found a fisherman, and compelled him, much against his inclination, to pilot us to the Key of Jutia Gorda, one of the places of our destination, and at about 4 P. M. descried the masts of a vessel lying nearly concealed by the bushes under said Key. We immediately pushed for her, and when we approached within hail she hoisted Spanish colors, and ordered us to keep off or she would fire into us, having her guns trained and matches lighted, with which they made several ineffectual attempts to fire the gun pointed upon the advancing boat; the channel being very crooked and narrow, the boats grounded several times; at length, one of the British cutters succeeded in passing the bar, and as two boats abreast could not approach, the officers and crews of the others were ordered to jump overboard and wade to the shore; where, taking a commanding position on the bank of the inlet in which she was anchored, and within twenty yards of her, I ordered her commander instantly to come on shore, and not fire at his peril. After much hesitation, and reiterated threats to fire upon us, he obeyed; by this time every one on board was in great confusion. Instead of coming to me, he and a man who had accompanied him, attempted to make their escape; the commander, however, was seized, but his companion fled to the mangrove bushes. I now directed him to order his colors to be hauled down, and to surrender his vessel and crew. He did order his colors to be struck, but at the same moment a musket or pistol was fired at the cutter then close alongside, which was immediately returned, and a general fire ensued; the leader of the band, availing himself of the confusion, attempted flight; I fired at and wounded him; he fell, but rising very soon and attempting to fight his way through our men with a long knife, he received several other wounds, and was retaken. Many of the pirates, in endeavoring to make their escape by jumping overboard to gain the mangrove bushes, were shot; whilst others, seeing no chance of escape, were driven below by the boarders and musketry from shore.

On taking possession of her, she proved to be a schooner mounting two six-pounders on pivots, four large swivels, and several blunderbusses, and completely equipped for a complement of thirty-five men, which was the least number she could have had on board, as we took nineteen persons, and can account for eight killed. Several effected their escape into the mangrove bushes, and we are induced to believe that others were killed, whose bodies are supposed to have floated out to sea unobserved, as there was a strong ebb tide. Among the prisoners are six wounded, one of whom is their chief, and calls himself Antonio Ripol. We were fortunate in having but one man wounded, a British marine, who received a slight cut in the arm.

After securing the prisoners, we searched the schooner, and discovered that, with the evident intention of blowing us up, they had placed lighted cigars in and near the magazine, which were soon carefully removed. We also found many articles on board, of American produce, (and to all appearance but recently taken, as the cases were quite new and clean:) New York hats, shoes, flour, rice, cheese, butter, lard, &c., &c., and to confirm their character, if there had been the least shadow of doubt remaining, we found the counterpart of these articles concealed in a thicket about twenty yards from the vessel, which was approached by a meandering path, and could only be discovered by careful search, so cautious were they in their operations. The following morning at daylight, Lieutenant Ward and myself took with us three boats and proceeded to windward, leaving Lieutenant Cunningham in charge of the prize, prisoners, &c. We soon after discovered a large schooner, rigged "Regla boat," gave chase, and, at 11 A. M., the crew, finding we were gaining fast upon them, made for the nearest mangrove island, jumped overboard, and effected a precipitate retreat to the bushes, leaving everything standing, with a keg of gunpowder open near the galley fire, and quantities of it strewed all over the vessel. The powder was instantly thrown overboard, and the fire extinguished. She proved to be the boat whose crew had murdered the five men belonging to the American brig Betsey, that was wrecked on the Double Headed Shot Keys, in December last. After a long and ineffectual search among the mangrove bushes, for the fugitives, we took the boat in charge, and pushed on to the Key la Cosinerra, where they sailed from in the morning, being their place of resort and establishment; this we burnt, and returned to Jutia Gorda at midnight, the officers and men being nearly exhausted, the latter having been at their oars from daybreak.

The schooner and boats being laden with the property found secreted in the woods and elsewhere, we set fire to the buildings on the Key, consisting of two very large huts, and some outhouses.

At this place was an old man, of more genteel appearance than the rest, whose situation was so suspicious, that I thought proper to bring him with me. I have since discovered that he is the commandant of Sagua la Grande, and, in some way, intimately connected with these pirates. His papers I transmit to you separate from those found on board the vessel. Having distributed the prisoners on board the different boats, we got under way, together with the prizes, and sailed for Sagua la Grande, where, according to previous arrangement, we met H. B. M. schooner Lion, Lieut. Liardet commanding, who politely offered to receive the prisoners on board his vessel, to relieve us of the inconvenience of having them in deeply laden boats, and they were accordingly removed. We now continued our route to Cadiz Bay, and rejoined H. M. schooner Union and this vessel, reached Key Mona in company, on the evening of the 29th ultimo, where we found the Dartmouth still at anchor. Captain Maude, when informed of the capture in which his boats had assisted, expressed a strong desire to communicate with you, previously to the prisoners being disposed of for trial; I in consequence repaired to Matanzas to inform you of his wish, but finding that you had sailed for this place, I instantly returned to the Dartmouth, and made application for the prisoners, upon which they were removed to this vessel.

I regret to have to add that, in a heavy squall on the evening of the 30th, the prize schooner parted both her cables, and having the "Regla boat" in tow, they were both driven ashore on Stone Key, and bilged. The property, however, was taken out the same night, and the greater part of it saved, by the united efforts of H. M. schooners Union and Lion, and this vessel, after which the wrecks were fired.

The handsome manner in which we were seconded by the officers and crews of the boats of H. M. ship Dartmouth, merits our highest approbation; nor can I, in justice, omit mentioning the cheerfulness and alacrity with which Lieutenants Cunningham and Engle, Doctor Dubarry, and Mr. Barron, secretary, and the men throughout, performed their several duties; manifesting a degree of enterprise and zeal, amidst all their privations and fatigues, highly creditable to them.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration and respect, sir, your obedient servant,

I. M'KEEVER.

To Com. Lewis Warrington, Com. U. S. Naval Forces in the West Indies, &c.

Extract of a letter from Commodore L. Warrington to the Secretary of the Navy, dated —

U. S. Steam Galliot Sea Gull, Mantanzas, April 27, 1825.

Their present plan of operations confines them to their hiding places, on the shores and keys of this island, until the appearance of merchant vessels induces them to go out, and a certainty of the absence of our cruisers, or their boats, enables them to consummate their intentions, by the capture of the vessel and destruction of the crew. No sooner is this effected, their plunder secured, and the vessel disposed of, than their position is changed, and a new rendezvous, far removed from the scene of their late exploit, is selected. If to this method of carrying on their depredations, we add the fact, that many open boats and small vessels, apparently coasters, are also engaged in this business, you can readily perceive the difficulty, if not impossibility, of suppressing piracy on these shores. The most certain, and I may add, the only sure way to end it, is to explore often those parts of the coast where you have reason to believe them to be, to harass them by frequent excursions, and to seize for examination all boats or vessels which are of a suspicious character. It not unfrequently happens, that vessels having a commission to cruise for a certain time, for the protection of the island trade, commit piracies; and the schooner called "El Socorro," lately captured by the Sea Gull, &c., is an instance of it. If she had been suffered to pass unmolested, the injury done our commerce, and the loss of our citizens' lives would have been doubtless, very great.

Extract of a letter from Commodore L. Warrington to the Secretary of the Navy, dated —

U. S. Ship Constellation, Matanzas, July 7, 1825.

There are several Colombian privateers cruising off this island, which gives rise to the many accounts of piratical vessels which are published in our newspapers. One of them is a small schooner of thirty-five tons, and might easily be taken, at a distance, for a vessel of that character.

U. S. Ship Constellation, Thompson's Island, June 22, 1825.

Sir: I have the honor to inform you that the United States ship Constellation arrived at this place, where she will remain for a few days, on the 14th, after landing Mr. Poinsett at La Vera Cruz, as you have been already informed. Your letters by her have been received, and shall be attended to. I shall be compelled to send the Sea Gull to Norfolk for repairs, as she is in a crazy condition. The Grampus I shall also send to the same place, early in August, to procure a new mainmast; and, as the Hornet also requires a considerable quantity of stores and sails, which we have not here, I shall direct her to repair to the same place in July. The two first of these vessels will have been out ten months, and the last twelve months. Their equipments and repairs will not delay them more than two or three weeks, and when the Porpoise, which I am daily expecting, arrives, we shall be able to watch the coasts of Cuba narrowly, and, I trust, effectually. The John Adams, Spark, Terrier, and Grampus, are now cruizing off different parts of that island. The Sea Gull is on an expedition with the barges, and the Fox, on her arrival from the Main with Mr. Bolton, will be put on the convoy and barge service with the Terrier. I shall, as soon as I can complete my arrangements in this quarter, proceed to St. Domingo, as directed by you some time since.

I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,

L. WARRINGTON.

I have directed Lieutenant Thomas B. Barton, of the marine corps, who goes home on a sick ticket, to report himself to you.

The Hon. Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

C.

Navy Department, May 24, 1825.

Sir: Circumstances connected with the health and efficiency of the squadron under your command, have induced the determination to make, at least, a temporary removal of so much of the forces and stores, now at Thompson's Island, as can be effected without inconvenience and loss to the public.

Pensacola has been selected as the place to which they will be transferred; and I enclose to you copies of communications received from the War Department, ordering the surrender of the fort, and adjoining barracks and houses, for the use of the navy. You are, therefore, hereby authorized to receive the possession from the military officer in command there, and if it be not convenient for you to go to that place, you will order some officer under your command to receive it for you. The stores, now at Thompson's Island, you will, as far as convenient, receive on board the vessels, thus preparing them for as long a cruise as their size and condition will permit. If, after this, any stores remain, you will send them to Pensacola, in the Decoy, or such other vessel as you may provide for the purpose. The marines now at the island you will dispose of as your discretion may dictate, and as they may be most useful in vessels, and at Pensacola.

It is believed that you will find full accommodation, both for men and stores, in the fort, barracks, and houses which the War Department has ordered to be transferred.

You will place the public property left upon the island in the best and safest situation, so that it may be kept from injury: and its possession and use resumed, whenever it shall be found expedient.

It is not intended that you shall altogether desert Thompson's Island. The public interests there will require you, or one of the vessels under your command, to visit it frequently, so as to afford every necessary protection and security to those who are upon it, and the commerce which passes by or is connected with it.

In the disposition of your force, after leaving Thompson's Island, you will exert that sound discretion on which the Department so confidently relies; protecting our commerce, watching attentively the movements of the pirates, and guarding vigilantly the health of those under your command. All these objects will, no doubt, be best promoted by the vessels continuing as constantly at sea as possible, touching seldom, and remaining a very short time, at any of the ports either of the islands, or on the shores of the gulf.

I repeat, for your consideration, the suggestion that you place your vessels at convenient distances from each other, directing each one to cruise backward and forward on a given position of the coast, and looking very frequently into the creeks, inlets, &c.

After effecting the changes mentioned in this letter, you will communicate fully, and minutely, to the Department the situation of all your vessels, and your wants as to officers, men, and stores, and make such suggestions respecting the whole as you may suppose useful to the public interests, and especially to the principal objects for which the squadron is maintained in the West Indies and the Gulf of Mexico.

I am, respectfully, &c., SAML. L. SOUTHARD.

Com. LEWIS WARRINGTON, commanding U. S. Naval Forces, West Indies.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, May 16, 1825.

The Secretary of War's compliments to the Secretary of the Navy, and transmits duplicates of orders issued in relation to the delivery of possession of the fort of Barancas, near Pensacola, to the Navy Department, until the further orders of the War Department.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE, Washington City, May 13, 1825.

SIR: An order will this day be sent from the Adjutant General's Office for the removal of the troops from Barancas to Cantonment Clinch.

You will transfer the post, with the barracks at and near it, to such officer, either of the navy or marine corps, as the Navy Department may designate; and, if there is no building there suitable for a store house, you will, if practicable, furnish one of the public buildings in Pensacola for that purpose.

I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

TH. S. JESUP, Brigadier General, and Quartermaster General.

Captain D. E. BURCH, Assistant Quartermaster, Pensacola, Florida.

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE, Washington, May 13, 1825.

The troops stationed at Fort Barancas will be immediately removed to Cantonment Clinch, and the stores on hand belonging to the Quartermaster General's and Ordnance Departments, will also be removed. The post will then be delivered over to such officer as the Secretary of the Navy may designate.

Communicated by order of Major General Brown.

R. JONES, Adjutant General.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, September 15, 1825.

GENTLEMEN: You are hereby appointed to select a site for a naval establishment at Pensacola, and the United States ship Hornet has been ordered to be prepared immediately for sea, under the command of Capt. Woodhouse, to take you to that place.

You will assemble at Norfolk, Va., on or about the 1st of October, and proceed to Pensacola as soon as convenient; and on your arrival enter upon the discharge of this duty, which has been confided to you with a full reliance on your judgment and discretion.

You are already aware of the disadvantages which have resulted from the injudicious location of other yards; and, in making a selection in this instance, you will take into view the actual expense and conveniences, as well as the practicability of defence.

After having made choice of the site which may appear most suitable, you will enter into an agreement with the proprietor or proprietors, for the purchase of the land, subject to the approbation of this Department; if, however, this cannot be obtained, and you deem it important to the public interests to complete the contract without such sanction, you are authorized to make the purchase unconditionally. You will take care to secure not only as much land as will be required for present purposes, but as much also as may, at any time hereafter, be wanted.

Any maps, charts, or other documents, in the possession of the Department, which may be considered necessary, will be furnished upon application. You have herewith an outline of the fortifications contemplated to be erected by the War Department for the protection of the harbor.

After accomplishing this important object, Capt. Warrington will either remain at Pensacola, or proceed wherever his duties as commander of the naval forces in that quarter may require his presence; the others will return in such manner as may be found most expedient.

It is presumed that the whole may be completed, and your report upon the subject made to the Department, previously to the meeting of Congress.

I am, respectfully, &c., SAML. L. SOUTHARD.

WM. BAINBRIDGE, Esq.,
LEWIS WARRINGTON, Esq.,
JAMES BIDDLE, Esq.,
Captains U. S. Navy.

PENSACOLA, November 4, 1825.

SIR: Pursuant to your instructions to us of the 15th September, we embarked at Norfolk on board the United States ship Hornet, as soon as she was ready for sea. We arrived here on the 25th ultimo, and since our arrival, have been engaged in the necessary examinations and inquiries for ascertaining the most eligible position within these waters for a navy yard.

The Bay of Pensacola is extensive and capacious, easy of access from sea, and affording secure anchorage for any number of vessels of the largest class. The depth of water on the bar, as laid down by Major Kearney, of the topographical engineers, is twenty-one feet. From the report to us of Lieutenant Pinkham, of the John Adams, whom we directed to sound, and from all the information we have been enabled to collect, at least this depth of water, we believe, will always be found on the bar, even after a long continuance of northerly winds. The northerly winds sensibly affect the waters on this part of the coast; they, however, seldom continue long. The ordinary tides do not rise more than three feet; but these tides run with considerable rapidity; thus affording facilities to vessels working in or out of the harbor against an unfavorable wind.

The position which we have selected as in our judgment combining the greatest advantages for a navy yard, is in the vicinity of the Barancas, and to the northward and eastward of Tartar's Point.

Here we found the necessary depth of water nearest the shore; an important consideration in respect to the expense to be incurred in carrying out the wharves required for naval purposes. Here too the works erected for the defence of the navy yard, would give additional security to the harbor, while its vicinity to the Barancas would admit of assistance to it in case of need, from the troops stationed there. Here, we are, in our opinion, susceptible of complete defence, at a less expense than elsewhere within the bay. The position is wholly protected, by Tartar's Point, against the swell of the sea, which strong southerly winds set over the bar.

It is favorably situated for rendering prompt assistance to vessels approaching the harbor. Its healthiness is not surpassed by any other part of the bay, and fresh water is there abundant, and of a wholesome quality.

Other positions, in other parts of the bay, have engaged our attention; but, upon mature consideration, we are unanimously of opinion that the position which we have designated, is the most eligible under all circumstances, and combines the greatest advantages.

The accompanying sketch exhibits the position which has been selected, and embraces the quantity of land we recommend to be retained for a naval establishment.

That part of your instructions which directs us to purchase the land, we are not necessitated to act upon, as the site we have selected already belongs to the government. It appears from the report of the commissioners appointed to examine the land claims in West Florida, that Mr. Roseblane claimed 800 arpens, which embraced Tartar's Point. This claim, however, was rejected by the commissioners, and is therefore presumed to be not valid.

It was our intention to have returned by land, as being preferable to taking a public vessel from the station; but it has been deemed necessary that the John Adams, now lying here, should leave the West Indies, on account of the debilitated state of her crew; we shall, therefore, embark in that ship as soon as she is ready for sea, and proceed in her to the Chesapeake.

We have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servants,

WM. BAINBRIDGE.
L. WARRINGTON.
JAMES BIDDLE.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, December 2, 1825.

SIR: The instructions which were given to Captains Bainbridge, Warrington, and Biddle, to select a site for a navy yard and depot on the coast of Florida, in the Gulf of Mexico, have heretofore been submitted to you, and I have now the honor to present to you a copy of their report, with a sketch exhibiting the position, which is, in their opinion, best calculated for the object.

Great pains have been taken to acquire the most correct information and safest guides, in making a location for this establishment, and no doubt is entertained that the one recommended by these officers is the best within the range prescribed by the law.

Should it meet your approbation, immediate measures will be taken to erect the necessary buildings, and make the improvements.

With the highest respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD.

The PRESIDENT of the United States.

Extract of a letter from Commodore John Rodgers to the Secretary of the Navy, dated —

U. S. Ship North Carolina, Gibraltar Bay, July 5, 1825.

I contemplate leaving here to-morrow, with all the vessels of the squadron, consisting of the North Carolina, Constitution, Erie, and Ontario, for the head of the Mediterranean, touching at Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli, on my way up; and shall probably not reach this again before some time about the 1st of October. Our relations with the Barbary States continue on the same friendly footing as they have heretofore done.

Extract of a letter from Commodore John Rodgers to the Secretary of the Navy, dated —

U. S. Ship North Carolina, Gibraltar Bay, July 7, 1825.

Just at the moment of unmooring, to proceed up the Mediterranean with the squadron, I have received a communication from Mr. Pulis, our consul at Malta, of which the enclosed are copies. It is, I find, the opinion of the best informed people in this quarter, that, in the event of the failure of the Greeks to establish their independence, a large portion of their present marine will become pirates, and that they will, it is most likely, as in former times, prey upon every defenceless merchant vessel that falls in their way. The noble cause in which they are engaged, would almost forbid such an idea; yet, as the like has happened heretofore, at different periods of their history, it may happen again; and for this reason I shall keep an eye to that quarter; particularly as our commerce to Smyrna, at this time, is very considerable, and I am told, progressively increasing. Should the winds prove favorable, I shall, it is likely, be in the vicinity of Scio by the last of this month. The appearance of the squadron about this time in the Archipelago, will no doubt have a good effect; and should anything occur, before I leave there, to render it necessary, I may probably leave one of the sloops there, to protect our commerce against any lawless depredations that appear likely to happen.

Extract of a letter from Commodore John Rodgers to the Secretary of the Navy, dated —

U. S. Ship North Carolina, Gibraltar Bay, October, 1825.

I wrote you from Smyrna, on the 30th of August, by the brig Cherub, of Boston, informing you of the movements of the squadron up to that date. At that time there was some cause for alarm, on account of the prevalence of a bowel complaint with which many of the officers and men of the squadron were affected: but, by the early and judicious applications, and unremitting attentions, of the medical officers, the virulence of the disease was soon arrested. In addition to this, there have been some cases of fever on board each ship, by which the service has lost a valuable young officer in Midshipman Pleasanton, who was, at the time of his death, attached to the Erie; and Mr. Adam Marshall, the schoolmaster of this ship, whose exemplary deportment had gained him the esteem of all who knew him. The officers and crews of the several vessels of the squadron are again very generally in the enjoyment of good health: and the returns herewith sent you will show, that, although there might have been cause for alarm, at one time, the proportion of deaths for the last six months, considering the number of men, and season of the year, has been very small.

In my last, I mentioned that I should probably put myself in the way of seeing the Greek and Turkish fleets, before my return to Gibraltar: and with this intention I accordingly left the Gulf of Smyrna, on the 9th ultimo, shaping my course for Napoli di Romani, (the present seat of the Greek government,) at which place I arrived on the 12th ultimo. Here we were received by the government in the most friendly and courteous manner.

The present embarrassed condition of the Greek government is such as to prevent its authority being much regarded by the licentious part of the community; the consequence of which is, that already several piracies have been committed in the Archipelago, principally, however, upon Austrian and French vessels. The morning previous to my leaving Smyrna, the commander of the Austrian naval forces sent into that place seven Greek boats, which he had captured for alleged piracies committed.

Piracies are carried on now by such boats only; but, it is feared in the event of a dissolution of the government, and which some think is not at all improbable, that their misery, and the want of the common means to support life, will necessarily oblige a large portion of the Greek sailors to become pirates, to avoid starvation; and in this event, that many of their larger vessels will be employed in this way.

Under this state of things, I have left the Ontario at Smyrna, for the protection of our commerce in the Archipelago, with orders for her commander to join me, at Gibraltar or Mahon, by the middle of December, provided a necessity for his long continuance in that quarter should cease, but that, in the event of such a change taking place as to render the presence of a greater force necessary, to apprise me of it without delay.

Our relations with the Barbary powers continue on the same friendly footing as heretofore. On leaving the Archipelago, I shaped my course for Tripoli, with the intention of calling at that place; but was prevented doing so, in consequence of meeting one of the Bashaw's cruisers, to the southward of Malta, returning home with two Neapolitan vessels, his prizes, which he had captured on the coast of Calabria; from the commander of which vessel I learned that our consul was absent from Tripoli, and had been for some time. From this I steered for Algiers, and after looking into the bay, directed the Erie to anchor, for the purpose of communicating with the consulate there; and after doing so, made sail for this place, where I arrived on the 9th instant.

The Erie has just arrived from Algiers, which affords me an opportunity of enclosing to you Captain Deacon's report, and of closing this communication.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE UNITED STATES, Callao Bay, October 2, 1824.

SIR: By Mr. Hunter, I had the honor to forward a copy of a commission and other papers, furnished a privateer fitted out by General Rodil, Governor of Callao, previous to the departure of the Franklin from this station; and, as Commodore Stewart will lay before you his correspondence with the vice King on the subject of those vessels and the legality of the papers under which they sailed, I have no doubt but I shall be furnished, without delay, with your instructions what course I am to pursue towards vessels sailing under the Spanish flag, without their commission being signed by the vice King, and commissioned only by a governor of a province, holding only the rank of a general in the army. One of the vessels commissioned by General Rodil, and fitted out at this place, has been burnt by Admiral Guise, after having lost her topmast, and otherwise injured, whilst this ship was in chase of her.

There is now lying in this bay two other brigs and a ship, ready for sea, no doubt furnished with the same papers that they sailed under on a former cruise; and, notwithstanding I have the assurance of the governor that they have orders not to capture neutral ships, I have no doubt but they will capture our ships should they fall in with them, particularly those that have provisions on board. I cannot, therefore, but hope, that the force on this station will be increased, either by sending out a line of battle ship or one of our large frigates and one or two schooners, as it is impossible to protect our commerce on such an extent of coast as Chili and Peru; indeed, we have valuable ships in most of the ports on the coast, from Valparaiso to Panama, and, in most of the ports, ships can be taken out by the smallest privateers, as they generally lie at anchor where there is no fort to protect them; it therefore requires a force to be constantly moving up and down the coast, and it is absolutely necessary that one vessel should remain constantly in this bay, and another at Valparaiso, and others moving along the coast with convoy.

Our force in this sea is now much less than that of any other nation, and our commerce is greater than that of any other, except the English; indeed, the English and Americans have the exclusive trade; not a flag is to be seen on board a merchant ship but those of England and the United States.

The Peacock is now at Quilca, to protect our commerce at the Intermedios, under orders to join this ship, after being absent six weeks. The Dolphin is at Valparaiso for the purpose of giving convoy to ships bound to this place. I have this day given orders for her to join me at this place without delay, that I may have force sufficient to watch the movements of the Spanish forces now ready for sea.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

ISAAC HULL.

HON. SAM'L L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy.

U. S. FRIGATE UNITED STATES, Callao Bay, November 2, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the Peacock arrived in this bay on the 25th ultimo, from Quilca, where I had ordered her to protect our commerce. She was absent six weeks, which was the time limited by my orders given to Lieutenant Commandant Kennon.

At the time the Peacock arrived I was absent with this ship, having left this bay for Huacho, for the purpose of convoying to this place several vessels which had been ordered off by the Peruvian squadron, under Admiral Guise; those vessels, such as wished to enter the bay, are now here.

Immediately on my arrival, I dispatched the Peacock to cruise for a few days off Pisco, to gain intelligence, if possible, of the course the Spanish squadron had taken, and what part of the coast they were destined for; as I consider it necessary to watch their movements as closely as it can be done, without giving them cause to suspect the object for which the Peacock is sent out.

The Dolphin is now at Valparaiso for the purpose of giving convoy to such of our merchant ships as may be there, and wish to avail themselves of it. I however received information last evening from Valparaiso, and find that there is not more than one or two vessels that are bound to this part of the coast.

As the Spanish squadron is out, and it has not been ascertained where they are bound, and there being several valuable ships at Truxillo, and other small ports on the coast to the northward, I shall dispatch the Peacock to Truxillo for their protection, and to convoy down two American vessels that will be ready to sail in three or four days; she will probably be absent twenty-five days, when she will return to this port, touching at the small ports on the coast, to give convoy to such vessels as may wish to join her.

With very great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

ISAAC HULL.

HON. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

U. S. FRIGATE UNITED STATES, Callao Bay, November 4, 1824.

SIR: I have yesterday been informed that the American ship China has been secured by the officers of the customs of Callao, for having transhipped a quantity of goods to the American brig Rimac without obtaining a permit to do so.

By the best information I can get, I have every reason to believe that the transhipment was made without a permit, and I much fear that the vessel and cargo will be condemned. The ship and cargo is said to be worth one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. I consider this seizure a very unfortunate one on many accounts, and more particularly so, as the China is well calculated for a vessel of war, and I have no doubt but she will be fitted out for that purpose, and be on a cruise in a few weeks.

I have already had the honor to apprise you that the Spanish squadron was at sea, and expressed my fear that they would capture neutral vessels; as yet, I have not received information that they have made any captures, but, from the temper and feelings of the Spaniards towards foreigners, and particularly Americans, I have no doubt but they will detain our ships on the slightest ground, and send them in for trial, and the case of the Nancy and other vessels captured and condemned, is evidence of what may be the fate of others that may fall into their hands.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

ISAAC HULL.

The honorable SECRETARY OF THE NAVY, Washington.

U. S. FRIGATE UNITED STATES, Ancon, November 14, 1824.

SIR: I have this moment received a letter from Mr. Tudor, our consul at Lima, under date of the 13th instant, an extract of which I have the honor to forward:

"I heard last evening that a bando would be issued to-day, declaring all the small ports, from Pisco to Truxillo, in a state of blockade, and that all persons transporting goods from Ancon, Chorillos, &c., would be shot."

I have not as yet received any confirmation of the above, but I have every reason to believe that the Spaniards will do all in their power to embarrass American commerce, and any measures that will do it most effectually I have no doubt will be adopted.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

ISAAC HULL.

Hon. SAM'L L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy.

U. S. FRIGATE UNITED STATES, Harbor of Callao, January 23, 1825.

SIR: Since the departure of Mr. Campbell nothing material has taken place. General Rodil still keeps possession of the castles of Callao, and is determined to defend them to the last extremity. He has from time to time postponed the trial of the China, in the expectation of the Spanish fleet returning to Callao. I have, in consequence, remained a greater part of the time in the bay, for the accommodation of Captain Goodrich, who has been alternately on board my ship and on shore.

I have no expectation of a favorable result in the case of the China. General Rodil is now closely invested by land and sea, and if his course was marked by such injustice when he was amenable to the authority of the vice King, it cannot be supposed that he will now relinquish anything in his power which would enable him to protract a siege.

The Chilian frigate O'Higgins, and two Columbian vessels, are in the bay; also four gun boats which were brought over from the Spaniards by the captain of the port a few nights since.

The China being endangered by the fire from these vessels, which approach the town every night, I wrote General Rodil, requesting that she might be sent out of danger until the trial was concluded; but I have received no reply; in fact, it is impossible to have any communication with him; my boats are allowed to approach only within a certain distance, and there met by a Spanish boat, into which Captain Goodrich is received, and no one but himself suffered to land.

The Dolphin arrived in this port last week from Valparaiso with a convoy of American vessels, having touched in with them at Coquimbo and Quilca. Judge Provost having requested a passage to Quilca, the Dolphin will leave to-morrow for that port, and having landed him, will proceed to Valparaiso.

So soon as the affair of the China is concluded I shall go down to Hauchas for a few days, and on my return shall stop at Santa to obtain a supply of wood, after which I hope the situation of affairs will enable me to go to Valparaiso, leaving the Peacock here.

I have great pleasure in telling you, sir, that the officers and crew of this ship are all in good health, and that I have from them the most cheerful compliance with my wishes.

I have the honor, sir, to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

ISAAC HULL.

To the Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD.

NAVY COMMISSIONERS' OFFICE, October 1, 1825.

SIR: Upon the subject of the estimate C, transmitted with our communication of this date, the Commissioners beg leave to observe, with respect to the compensation allowed to the clerks in this office, that a sense of justice impels them to remark, that the salaries generally are lower than those in other offices, and do not sufficiently compensate the clerks for the duties they actually perform, which are arduous, and require constant and indefatigable attention.

The following shows their present compensations, and those which the Commissioners respectfully propose, viz:

Present compensation.		Proposed compensation.
One	at $1,600 00	One	at $1,600
One	1,150 00	One	1,150
One	1,000 00	One	1,100
One	1,000 00	One	1,100
One	1,000 00	One	1,100
One	800 00	One	1,000
	$6,550 00		$7,050
Averaging	$1,091 40	Averaging	$1,175

The draftsman's duties are also very arduous, and they are performed with great attention and the most minute accuracy. He well deserves additional compensation, and the Commissioners would respectfully recommend, as an act of justice, that his salary be raised from $1,000 to $1,100.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

WM. BAINBRIDGE.

Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy.

Statement of the progress made under the law for the gradual increase of the navy, showing the time of commencing and completing the several vessels, and (see paper, No. 1,) the expenditures for each.

SHIPS OF THE LINE—LAUNCHED.

Columbus, built at Washington, commenced May, 1816; launched March, 1819. Delaware, built at Gosport, commenced August, 1817; launched October, 1820. North Carolina, built at Philadelphia, commenced February, 1818; launched September, 1821. Ohio, built at New York, commenced November, 1817; launched May, 1820. Four ships launched.

SHIPS OF THE LINE—BUILDING.

One at Portsmouth, N. H., commenced June, 1819. Two at Charlestown, Mass.—one commenced September, 1818; the other commenced May, 1822. One at Philadelphia, commenced September, 1821. One at Gosport, commenced May, 1820. Five ships building.

Nine ships of the line built and building.

FRIGATES—LAUNCHED.

Potomac, built at Washington, commenced August, 1819; launched March, 1822. Brandywine, built at Washington, commenced September, 1821; launched June, 1825. Two frigates launched.

FRIGATES—BUILDING.

One at Portsmouth, N. H., commenced August, 1821. Two at Brooklyn, N. Y.—No. 8, commenced July, 1820; No. 10, commenced February, 1823. One at Philadelphia, commenced September, 1820. Four frigates building.

FRIGATES TO BE BUILT.

One at Charlestown, Mass.; the frame and principal materials are provided, the building ways nearly completed, and it is expected the keel will be laid this autumn. One at Washington; the frame and principal materials procured—the keel will be laid in the ensuing month, (November.) One at Gosport; the frame and principal materials procured—the building ways are constructing, and preparations making for laying the keel as soon as the ways are finished, which are expected to be completed during the present year. Three frigates to be built.

RECAPITULATION.

Built—four ships of the line, two frigates.
Building—five ships of the line, four frigates.
Three frigates to be built.

NOTE.—The ships of the line and frigates now building, except the ship at Philadelphia, are nearly in as finished a state as is deemed advisable, until there is a probability of their being required for service; by leaving them uncaulked, and giving a free circulation of air, and being under cover, entirely protected from the weather, their timbers are improved by seasoning, and without doubt will be more durable than if launched immediately on being built—they can be launched in about ninety days.

The ship at Philadelphia will require about five months.

Contracts have been made for all the anchors, water tanks, copper, iron, and other imperishable materials, except kentledge, to complete the vessels authorized under gradual increase. Contracts for kentledge will be made in the ensuing month.

Although there appears on the Treasurer's books a large unexpended balance for the gradual increase, yet it is not, in the opinion of the board, too much to meet the demands of existing contracts, and other expenditures to complete the vessels, necessarily growing out of the execution of the law for increasing the navy.

Owing to the difficulty in obtaining mechanics, particularly ship carpenters, it has not been in the power of the commissioners to report such progress in the various operations in the several building yards as they could have wished, although they feel confident that every exertion has been made by the commandants of the respective yards.

No. 1.

Exhibit of expenditures for labor and materials of every description, on the ships built and building under the law for gradual increase.

Statement showing the progress made under the law for building ten sloops-of-war.

Orders were issued from this office immediately after the passage of the law to the respective commandants of the several navy yards, at Portsmouth, N. H., Philadelphia, Washington, and Gosport, for the construction of one sloop-of-war at each of the navy yards under their command, and also to the commandants at the yards at Charlestown, Mass., Brooklyn, N. Y., to make arrangements to commence, immediately, the construction of three sloops at each yard, two of which, at the former, and one at the latter yard, will be launched, and one at the former ready for sea, within the present year.

Contracts for the timber, and other materials, required for all the sloops authorized by law, have been made upon terms favorable to government, to be delivered within the ensuing year, in which time, it is believed, the entire number may be afloat.

Statement of the progress made in executing the instructions of the honorable the Secretary of the Navy of the 14th February last.

On the 26th February the several officers commanding the naval stations at Sackett's Harbor, Erie, and Whitehall, were required to inform the Board of Navy Commissioners of the best terms on which contracts could be obtained for the transportation of the ordnance and stores, &c., from the several stations to the Navy yard at Brooklyn, New York, and requiring them also to furnish the board with a list of such articles which, in their opinion, would be more advantageous to the public interest to sell than to transport, as well as at what prices the vessels at the several stations would sell for.

Mr. Robert Hugunin, on the 23d March, offered $8,000 for the eight vessels then lying sunk at Sackett's Harbor, stipulating to raise and remove them within eighteen months. The Commissioners accepted his offer, and his bonds, with security, have been received and transmitted to your Department.

An offer was also made for the Lady of the Lake and the gun boats at this place, which the Commissioners thought not equal to their value, and ordered them to be advertised for sale at public auction, together with such other articles as the board had determined to sell rather than have them transported, lists of which were furnished to the commandant of that station, and similar lists also transmitted to the commanding officers of the two other stations, who were directed to sell at auction, in addition to the articles embraced in those lists, all vessels, boats, launches, &c., &c., except the Ghent, at Erie.

Contracts to transport such articles as might be delivered for that purpose were made with Messrs. Dennison and Ely, from Sackett's Harbor, R. B. Heacock, from Erie, and Ezra Smith, from Whitehall, and their bonds, with security for the performance of their contracts, received, and, together with the contracts, have been transmitted to the Navy Department.

Paper No. 1, hereto annexed, will show the articles which have been transported under these contracts to the Navy yard at Brooklyn, up to the 15th September.

No. 2 will show the amount of sales at the several stations, so far as have been received, to have been $52,151.27.

It is believed that all the stores, &c., &c., at the several stations will have been sold or transported within the present year, so that all the persons now at each station may be transferred, except one captain or master commandant at Sackett's Harbor.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, March 3, 1825.

SIR: A law having passed which authorizes the building of ten sloops-of-war, it is important that immediate measures be taken to carry it into execution, especially so far as it can be done with the materials now on hand.

You will be pleased, therefore, to give the necessary orders upon the subject, and complete as many as circumstances will permit in the course of the spring and summer.

I am, respectfully, &c.,

SAML. L. SOUTHARD.

Com. WM. BAINBRIDGE, President Naval Board.

19TH CONGRESS.] No. 269. [1ST SESSION.

ON A CLAIM FOR PURSER'S SMALL STORES, LOST BY THE CAPTURE OF THE SLOOP-OF-WAR WASP.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DECEMBER 19, 1825.

Mr. STORRS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Catharine Wise, widow of George S. Wise, deceased, reported:

That they have had the said petition and documents under their consideration, and find that the said George S. Wise was a purser in the navy, attached to the sloop-of-war the Wasp, before and during the time of her cruise in which she was captured; that it was his duty, as purser of the ship, to furnish to the men on board the said sloop-of-war certain articles necessary to their health and comfort, usually called small stores; that there was on board the said vessel, when captured, articles of that description to a considerable amount in value. The committee are of opinion that his representatives are entitled, in justice and equity, to be credited by the accounting officers of the Department, the amount of all such articles as it shall satisfactorily appear to them were on board the said sloop-of-war at the time of her capture, and furnished by the said George S. Wise for the use of said sloop-of-war, on her said cruise, and for that purpose they have directed a bill to be reported.

PROCEEDINGS AND DOCUMENTS OF COURTS-MARTIAL AND OF INQUIRY ON THE COURSE OF COMMODORE DAVID PORTER, IN THE SUPPRESSION OF PIRACY, TRANSPORTATION OF SPECIE AND IN THE PURSUIT OF THE PIRATES AT FOXARDO, IN THE ISLAND OF PORTO RICO.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE DECEMBER 26, 1826.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, December 22, 1825.

SIR: In answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 14th inst., that the Secretary of the Navy "be directed to cause to be laid before the Senate the proceedings and judgment of the court of inquiry, in relation to the employment of the squadron under Commodore Porter, for the suppression of piracy in the West Indies, and the transportation of specie in vessels of the United States during the years 1823 and 1824, and also the proceedings of the court-martial in reference to the transactions at Foxardo," I have the honor to send a printed volume, which contains the information called for.

I have the honor to be very respectfully, &c.,

SAML. L. SOUTHARD.

The PRESIDENT of the Senate of the United States.

MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS OF THE COURT OF INQUIRY AND COURT-MARTIAL, IN RELATION TO CAPTAIN DAVID PORTER: CONVENED AT WASHINGTON, D. C., ON THURSDAY, THE SEVENTH DAY OF JULY, A. D. 1825.

PROCEEDINGS.

To Isaac Chauncey, Esq., Captain in the Navy of the United States:

It having been made to appear to the President of the United States, that on or about the fourteenth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, David Porter, Esquire, a captain in the navy of the United States, then in command of the naval forces of the United States in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico, did, with a part of the military force under his command, forcibly land upon the Island of Porto Rico, a part of the dominions of his Catholic Majesty the King of Spain, then and still at peace and in amity with the Government of the United States, and did then and there commit acts of hostility within the territories, and against the subjects, of the said King of Spain:

The President of the United States has deemed an inquiry into the conduct of the said David Porter, on that occasion, as well as into the causes which led to the same, to be necessary and proper.

And whereas certain representations having been made to the Government of the United States, in regard to the employment of the naval forces of the United States in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico, setting forth, in substance, that, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, the said naval forces were not employed in the suppression of piracy in the most effective manner, but were employed in the transportation of specie, and in other objects of inferior moment, to the neglect of the public interests; and the said David Porter, considering his conduct and character as the commander of said forces to be thereby implicated, has requested of this Department that an inquiry be made into the truth of said representations:

The President of the United States, in consideration of the premises, has charged me to convene a court of inquiry for the purpose of examining into the matters aforesaid.

You are therefore hereby ordered to proceed to the Navy yard at the city of Washington, on or before the second day of May next, to act as a member of said court, and to officiate as the president thereof.

Orders are also transmitted to Captain Wm. M. Crane and Captain George C. Read, to appear at the time and place aforesaid; and Richard S. Coxe, Esquire, is also appointed judge advocate, and will report himself to you in that capacity at the time and place aforesaid.

And the said court is hereby required to convene and organize at the said Navy yard at Washington, on the said second day of May, and is authorized and directed to summon before it such persons as may be deemed necessary to give information touching the matters aforesaid, and is also empowered, authorized and directed, diligently and strictly to inquire into the said matters, to make a statement of the facts in relation to the same as they shall appear to the court; and particularly to examine into and report the causes which led to the conduct of the said David Porter at the Island of Porto Rico, before mentioned; and to ascertain and report whether the naval forces of the United States were employed in the most effective manner in the suppression of piracy, or in objects of inferior moment, to the neglect of the public interests; all of which you will transmit to this Department, to be submitted to the President of the United States for his consideration. And for your so doing, this shall be to you and all concerned a sufficient warrant.

Given under my hand, and seal of the Navy Department of the United States, at the city of Washington, this nineteenth of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, and of the independence of the United States the forty-ninth.

(Signed) SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD. [L. S.]

Minutes of the proceedings of a court of inquiry, directed to investigate the conduct of David Porter, Esquire, a captain in the navy of the United States, convened at the Navy yard in the city of Washington, this second day of May, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, in obedience to the precept of the honorable the Secretary of the Navy, bearing date the nineteenth day of April, 1825, which is hereunto annexed, and marked A.

Captain Isaac Chauncey, appointed in and by the said precept, as president of said court, and Captains William M. Crane and George C. Read, members thereof, and Richard S. Coxe, judge advocate, appeared.

Captain David Porter also appeared, and being asked whether he had any objection to offer against either of the members of the court, replied that he had no specific objection to urge, but that he had some remarks which he wished to submit to the consideration of the court after it was organized, and previous to its proceeding to make the investigation for which it was convened. Whereupon, the oath prescribed by law, in such case, was administered by the judge advocate to the president and members of the court, and the president administered to the judge advocate the oath required by law to be taken by him.

Captain Porter then submitted and read to the court a paper containing certain remarks upon the precept by the authority of which the court had been convened; which was annexed to the record, and marked B.

The room being cleared, the court proceeded maturely to delibearte on the same; after some time it was opened, and the judge advocate informed Captain Porter that he had been instructed to read to him a letter which had been addressed by the judge advocate, by the directions of the court, to the Secretary of the Navy, by which he would be apprised of the course which the court had taken with regard to the paper submitted by him. Which letter was read, annexed, and marked C.

The court then adjourned till to-morrow morning, at 11 o'clock.

TUESDAY, May 3.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday: present as before.

The judge advocate submitted and read to the court a communication from the honorable the Secretary of the Navy, in answer to the letter yesterday addressed to him; which was annexed to the record, and marked D.

The judge advocate then submitted and read to the court certified copies from the Navy Department of certain papers annexed to the record, and marked (Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6.)

Charles T. Platt, a lieutenant in the navy of the United States, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

On the 24th October last, as I believe, about 7 o'clock in the morning, I received a communication from Messrs. Cabot, Baily and Co., commercial agents at St. Thomas, informing me that their store had been forcibly entered the preceding night, and robbed of goods to the amount of not less than five thousand dollars. I commanded the Beagle, then at St. Thomas. With this communication I received also a request from Messrs. Cabot and Baily to assist in recovering the goods. I went on shore and called on them, and there learned from merchants who had been previously robbed at the same place, that they had good reason for supposing that these goods had been taken to Foxardo, or in that neighborhood.

I lost no time in getting my vessel ready for sea, took with me a pilot furnished from the shore, and a clerk of Messrs. Cabot and Baily, with a description of the goods that had been stolen. On the evening of the 26th, about 6 o'clock, I anchored, with my colors flying, in the harbor of Foxardo. It was then so late that the pilot did not think it prudent to go on shore, or was not capable of showing me the way. Early the next morning (the 27th) a boat came alongside with a message from the captain of the port, who said he would be happy to see me on shore.

I inquired whether he was acquainted with the character of the vessel; to which he replied, yes. Lest he might be mistaken, I directed him to inform the captain of the port that it was the United States schooner Beagle, and that I should be on the shore as soon as possible. At about half-past six I landed; I was there met by a parcel of ruffians; I could hardly tell what they were. One of them informed me that I could not proceed up to the village. I inquired of him who he was, whether he was an officer or not? He gave me no satisfaction whatever, but merely repeated that I could not proceed up to the town. I then proceeded on without any interruption whatever, having been advised so to do by some citizens who were there, who informed me these people had no authority to stop me. Having entered the village, I first went to the captain of the port, having been informed by a gentleman, a citizen of the place, that this was proper. I informed the captain of the port of the object of my visit, and my reasons for appearing in citizen's dress, and, after producing the letter addressed to Mr. Campos, he appeared perfectly satisfied with my character, and directed me to call on the alcalde, and inform him. I called upon the alcalde and explained to him my object, and again produced the letter to Mr. Campos. He was perfectly satisfied with my character, and appeared very much pleased that I had taken the precaution to come on shore in citizen's dress.

He then stated that he had no doubt that he should be able to obtain the goods before night, or ascertain where they were. This conversation was entirely between ourselves, the interpreter only being present, every one else being out of hearing. He said the recovery of the goods would probably be attended with some expense. I replied, that if it was necessary to offer a reward for the recovery of the goods, I was authorized to offer one, not to exceed one thousand dollars. I then proposed going round to the different stores where it was possible these goods might have been deposited, with the police, and examine the goods, and see if they corresponded with the samples and descriptions we had. It was supposed that the goods which had been stolen were the only goods of that description in the country. He told me to let that matter rest, to let him manage the affair. He observed, that as I had very properly taken the precaution to come on shore in citizen's clothes, he thought it advisable to let it rest entirely with him; that if I accompaned him, it might excite some suspicion. I accordingly went to a public house and took my breakfast. About an hour after I had finished my breakfast, I received a message from the alcalde, requesting me to call at his office. I was then under the impression that he had made some discoveries in respect to the goods that I was in search of. I went over to his office directly. Lieut. Ritchie and the pilot were with me, to see what the result was.

I inquired, on my arrival at the office of the alcalde, whether he had sent for me, and for what purpose. To this the captain of the port replied, in the most provoking and insulting manner, that he had sent for me for the purpose of demanding my register. I informed them that I had previously offered to show my commission, my uniform and my colors, that I had no register, that a man of war carried none. He then told me that if I did not produce my register at once, he would imprison me. I then requested permission to go on board my vessel with any officer they might choose to go with me, and that I would satisfy them of the character of my vessel and of myself. I then stated to them that the insult which I had received from them was of that nature that it could not be overlooked on my part, and that I should make a formal report of it to Commodore Porter; and, lest that they might deny that they arrested and imprisoned me, that I should proceed directly on board my vessel, and leave the port. I left the office with the design of returning to my vessel, when I was pursued by soldiers, who took me by the collar, arrested and brought me back.

I then considered myself as a prisoner. After detaining me about an hour under charge of the sentry, with Mr. Ritchie and the pilot, they consented to let me send Mr. Bedford, the clerk, who had been sent down by Messrs. Cabot & Baily, on board the vessel, for my commission. I sent him on board, and directed him to bring my commission and uniform, though they did not require the latter. Mr. Bedford returned with them. I put on my uniform and showed them my commission, observing it was a thing which had never been required of me before.

After perhaps fifteen minutes' deliberation on the subject they pronounced the commission a forgery, and me a damned pirate, and ordered me to be confined in the jail. They called it the King's house, and not knowing what that meant, I thought they were about taking me to the most genteel house in the place. So soon as I approached near enough to discover that it was a guard house, well calculated to produce the yellow fever or plague, I objected to being confined there, and said I would not be unless they compelled it by force of arms. In about ten minutes they returned me to the quarters from which they had taken me, and placed me under charge of a sentry. After my return, I directed the interpreter to inquire what their object was; whether they meant to detain me, or what they wanted. The answer was they would detain me until they heard from St. John's, as I had produced nothing to satisfy them of my character. I informed them that what I had already shown them was all that it would be in my power to show them after hearing from St. Johns. They informed me I had shown nothing to satisfy them that I was ever ordered to that vessel as a lieutenant commandant.

I then requested permission to send on board for my orders; it was granted; I sent on board and got them. After producing my orders, they called a council, detained me till about fifteen minutes before sun-down, confined. I was then set at liberty, and ordered to go on board my vessel, which I did, laughed and hissed at by every blackguard in the street. In this way I left the village, went on board my vessel, and got under way.

On the 12th of November I was standing out of the harbor of St. Thomas, and discovered the John Adams, with her broad pendant flying, standing in to the harbor. As soon as the commodore came to anchor, I went on board and reported myself to him, and mentioned the circumstances that had led to my visit to Foxardo, and the treatment I met with there. The commodore replied that a written report was necessary. I informed him it should be done directly; that my not expecting him so soon was the cause why it had not already been made out. The commodore further informed me that if the circumstances of the case would justify my going there as I did, that he would visit Foxardo, and obtain redress for the insult offered to my person, and to the flag of the United States. I referred the commodore to Mr. Cabot and Mr. Furness, both commercial agents at that place, who would inform him that robberies of the same kind had been before committed, and the goods stolen traced to Foxardo, or the neighborhood.

The commodore directed me to go on shore and request Mr. Cabot to come on board and at the same time get a pilot. I saw Mr. Cabot, who immediately came on board with me. In the morning the pilot came on board the Beagle and I immediately got under way and stood out to the Adams, then under way by order of the commodore. I went on board the commodore and delivered my written report. I was then ordered to go ahead, with the pilot on board the Beagle, and make the best of my way to Foxardo.

The wind however was light, and we were obliged to lie to, off and on, during the night. The next morning at daylight, I was hailed and ordered to proceed again ahead.

At about seven o'clock a boat was sent on board from the commodore for the pilot, and I was directed to proceed on again to the south. At eight, signals were made to follow the motions of the commodore, who was standing in to the land. At nine, we came to anchor under the lee of Passage Island, where we remained until twelve at night, when the Grampus, the Beagle, the barges of the Adams, with as many of the officers and men as could be spared from the vessels, got under way and proceeded towards the harbor of Foxardo. At eight o'clock in the morning of the 14th, we came to anchor, with the Grampus and Beagle, in the harbor of Foxardo. The barges were officered and manned, and about landing; at this time one of them had been sent to attack a fort on an eminence at the beach. Commodore Porter, at the same time, sent by Lieutenant Stribling, a flag of truce to the alcalde of the place.

At half-past eight we commenced marching up from the landing to the village, which was about a mile and a half distant. We walked it in about fifteen or twenty minutes. After we arrived within about forty rods of the village, in a few minutes we discovered a field piece ahead, with a number of men with muskets. Commodore Porter ordered us to halt; about fifteen minutes after we discovered a white flag, which was accompanied by Lieutenant Stribling, the alcalde, the captain of the port, and the interpreter. They professed, when they met the commodore, not to know the object of his visit; the commodore informed them they ought to have known that from the tenor of his note. Asked them if they had not confined me after knowing that I was an American officer, and why they had done so? The alcalde admitted he had confined me after knowing I was an American officer, but said that he was not to blame, as he had been forced to do so by others. The commodore informed him that he had nothing to do with any other person; that he was the alcalde, and chief magistrate of the place, and that he held him responsible for the insult offered to me and to the flag. That as he had the power of confining, he certainly had the power of releasing me. The commodore then informed him there was no necessity for any altercation, that the time he had allowed had nearly expired, that there was about five or seven minutes remaining; that he required of them a suitable apology, such a one as should be dictated, the refusal of which would compel him to resort to force of arms, which should terminate in the final destruction of the village. They acceded to this, and apologized in the manner the commodore dictated, to the satisfaction of all present.

This being done, we proceeded down to the beach, refreshments were brought down, and we returned to the vessels and got under way.

I neglected mentioning the spiking two nine pounders which guarded the passage by which we marched up. I do not knot what they were loaded. There was a battery on the beach on the eminence, with two cannons. I saw the Spaniards by them with matches; they were training them upon the vessels. This battery was attacked by a barge, and the Spaniards ran without firing; the other barges landed at almost the same time on the beach within half a mile of the battery; they did not fire at us at all.

The court then adjourned till half-past 10 to-morrow morning.

WEDNESDAY, May 4.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday: present as before.

The court resumed the examination of Lieutenant Platt.

Question. Was the store of Messrs. Cabot & Baily in the town or island of St. Thomas?

Answer. The store of Messrs. Cabot & Baily was in the city of St. Thomas, the dock on the rear of the store.

Ques. Were those gentlemen at the time resident merchants at St. Thomas?

Ans. Yes; those gentlemen were American citizens residing at St. Thomas?

Ques. Did any communications pass between yourself and the authorities of St. Thomas, in relation to the alleged robbery?

Ans. No; I had no communications with the authorities at St. Thomas. I understood from Mr. Cabot, and subsequently from the governor, that some had passed between them.

Ques. Did you carry any letter or other document from the Governor or other officer of St. Thomas, or any force furnished from that island?

Ans. No; I carried no paper from any official person at St. Thomas, but a private letter from one of the most respectable merchants there, addressed to Mr. Campos, one of the most respectable merchants at Foxardo.

Ques. What orders had you received from Commodore Porter, which you considered as authorizing the steps you took?

Ans. I had received orders to protect our commerce in every manner which was consistent with the rules of the service. I understood myself as authorized to go on shore at Foxardo, and inform the police of the robbery that had been committed, which was the object I had in view.

Ques. Did the messenger from the captain of the port, or the captain of the port himself, intimate in your first conversation with them that they knew the vessel then in port to be an American man-of-war?

Ans. Yes; the captain of the port, in my first interview with him, appeared perfectly satisfied of the fact, and took down the name of the vessel, and the names of myself and officers, and our force.

Ques. In your first interview with the captain of the port, or the alcalde, did you request them to act in the recovery of the property of which you were in search, or did you propose to search for, and take, the property yourself?

Ans. I requested them to act, to search for the goods; not intending to act myself at all. I afterwards proposed going myself with the police, which they objected to as unnecessary.

Ques. Did Commodore Porter know anything of the transaction at Foxardo, previous to your communication to him?

Ans. No; he did not.

Ques. Do you know whether any communications were made to the authorities at Porto Rico, either by yourself or Commodore Porter, prior to the landing of the force at Foxardo?

Ans. I knew of none.

Ques. In what boat or vessel did Lieutenant Stribling go to Foxardo, and what length of time elapsed between his going with the flag of truce, and the landing on the beach?

Ans. Lieutenant Stribling went down to Foxardo in the Grampus, and landed about the same time that the men did.

Ques. Where did he receive his instructions from the commodore; at Foxardo, or before your arrival there?

Ans. I do not know.

Ques. How many officers and men were landed? How were they armed? What orders were given by the commodore to the landing party, or to those who remained behind?

Ans. I believe that about two hundred officers and men were landed. I do not know what orders were given to those who remained. I was ordered to land with as many men as I could conveniently, without crowding, carry in the boats. The men were armed with muskets, boarding pikes, cutlasses and pistols. I heard no other orders given than that; after we landed, we were directed by the commodore to fall into line and march up.

Ques. Had any answer been received to the communications made through Lieutenant Stribling, before the landing of the men and the spiking of the guns in the battery on the beach, and the two nine-pounders between the beach and the town?

Ans. None that I know of.

Ques. What is the distance between Foxardo and St. Johns?

Ans. I think about forty miles.

Ques. Did the interpreter appear to be an intelligent man, well acquainted with the Spanish and English languages? And do you understand Spanish sufficiently well to know whether he interpreted correctly?

Ans. The interpreter appeared perfectly acquainted with both languages. I understood some things that were said, and my pilot, who understood both languages, told me that he interpreted correctly.

The examination of the witness, in chief, having been closed, Captain Porter was asked whether he had any questions to propose to the witness, to which he replied, that before proceeding to take any steps in his defence, he had some remarks to submit to the court, which he read, and submitted to the court; the paper was annexed to the record, and marked E.

The room was then closed, and, after some time, was opened, when the judge advocate informed Captain Porter that the court had maturely deliberated upon the paper submitted by him; that, after full consideration, the court is of opinion that the matter of the communication, as well as the language in which it is couched, is in several particulars so highly objectionable that, could the court have anticipated its character and contents, it would not have been suffered to be read. The court consider it as highly disrespectful, both to the Secretary of the Navy and to the court itself. This court cannot submit to hear from any officer animadversions on the conduct and accusations against the head of the Department, wholly foreign to the investigation in which it is engaged: nor can it, without forfeiting its own self-respect, listen to language so offensive to itself. The court is willing to believe that this objectionable character may be attributed to the hasty manner in which the paper appears to have been drawn up; and that Captain Porter, on consideration, will feel himself disposed, as well to perceive as to rectify the grounds of objection.

In order however to prevent a recurrence of such unpleasant circumstances, the court has ordered that, in future, no communication be received unless in writing: and the paper must previously be submitted to the judge advocate for the consideration of the court.

The judge advocate further informed Captain Porter that the court had likewise directed him to state, that when the question was asked him on the opening of the court whether he had any objections to make to any member of the court, he was understood to say distinctly that he had none; but that he wished to submit to the court some "remarks on the precept by which the court was convened, and the materials of which it was constituted." It was then suggested to him, that, as the court had not yet been organized, it could at that time hear nothing from him, but that the proper period would be after the members had been sworn in. This suggestion was made by the judge advocate, and apparently acquiesced in by Captain Porter.

Immediately after the organization of the court, Captain Porter read and submitted to the court the paper which has been annexed to, and constitutes part of, the record.

Conceiving that it contained not a challenge to the court, or a specific exception to any member of the court, but objections applying exclusively to the precept under which it had been convened; and that these objections, if presented to the government, might possibly induce some change in the precept, with which the court had no authority to interfere; feeling also that the exceptions which had been urged, involved the competency of the major part of the members of the court,—a question on which delicacy forbade them to express an opinion, when it had not been presented distinctly to their decision; the court determined to pursue the course which was adopted, and of which Captain Porter was immediately apprised.

If, however, Captain Porter did design to raise a question for the decision of the court, as to the legality of the precept under which it is acting, the court has no hesitation in saying that it entertains no doubt upon the subject. Had any doubt existed, the court would have put it in a way to be satisfactorily decided, before proceeding to act under it.

The court is aware that it possesses no power to compel Captain Porter to take any part in this investigation; but it is equally satisfied that his acts can in no degree interfere with the duty of the court, to proceed in the investigation which it has been charged to make by the competent authority.

The court then adjourned till 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

THURSDAY, May 5.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday: present as before.

Captain Porter stated to the court, that on perusing the record, it appeared to him that an omission had been made, (which he was desirous of having supplied,) in stating the proceedings of the first day. He submitted to the court his statement of the remarks which he made before the oath was administered to the members. The court being of opinion that Captain Porter is entitled to have his statement inserted in the record, as containing his view of what transpired, directed it to be inserted. It is in the words following, viz:

"Captain Porter being asked whether he had any objection to offer against either of the members of the court, replied that he had no specific objection to individuals; but he objected to the materials of which the court was composed, and stated further, that he had some remarks to make on the subject, as well as on the precept; that he did not think the court was legally formed."

Captain Porter then submitted to the judge advocate, for the consideration of the court, a paper. The court was cleared, and after some time, was opened. The judge advocate informed Captain Porter that he was instructed by the court to say, that the paper has been maturely considered; that it is deemed objectionable from the style of animadversion upon what has transpired, and of instruction as to the future conduct of the court. The court, therefore, will permit Captain Porter to withdraw it. Should he, however, wish it to be inserted on the record in its present shape, it shall be done, accompanied by such remarks as the court conceives it due to themselves to make.

Captain Porter declined to withdraw the paper; it was accordingly read, annexed to the record and marked F, and the judge advocate informed him as follows:

The court feels constrained to make some remarks upon the animadversions which Captain Porter has thought himself entitled to pass upon its conduct. The court did understand Captain Porter to waive or decline challenging any of the members of the court, but at the same time to intimate as an objection, which he conceived existed against the organization of the court, that two of the members were his juniors in rank. The court did not at any time suppose that this objection had any foundation, either in the letter or spirit of the law. The law is silent on the subject. The only qualification required is, that the members of the court should be commissioned officers.

"The materials, then, of which this court is constituted," are conceived to be wholly free from any legal objection. Nor is there anything in the spirit of the law which the court has been able to perceive, leading to a different conclusion. Every member of this court holds the same commission with Captain Porter; all are captains, one his senior, two his juniors, in date of commission. The court, however, is clearly and unhesitatingly of opinion that no law would be violated, either in its letter or spirit, by the appointment of any three commissioned officers to constitute a court of inquiry into the conduct of any officer. Courtesy and a regard to the feelings of the officer whose actions are to be investigated, will, it is presumed, in all cases prevent the government from selecting officers of a very inferior grade, to sit upon an inquiry into the conduct of an officer of elevated rank.

But this principle can scarcely be carried to an extent which would apply to a court, every individual of which holds the highest commission known to the American navy. At all events, this is an objection which the court conceived, and still conceives, can be properly decided only by the Executive. This court can in no manner interfere with such a question.

In this instance, likewise, it appeared to the court to be so connected with other comments upon the precept, as to present itself before the court rather as an animadversion upon the conduct of the Executive in thus organizing the court than as a challenge formally presenting the question for its decision. Captain Porter seems himself to have so viewed it, for he assigns his reasons for making this court the organ of his communications with the Department.

The court thinks proper further to remark, that the single object for which it has been constituted, is to inquire into the official conduct of Captain Porter; and to report to the Department the facts which may be proved. The court possesses no power to adjudge Captain Porter innocent or guilty; it has no authority to impose punishment. The duties imposed are enjoined by the competent authority. The interference of Captain Porter in pursuing this investigation, however desirable it may be as calculated more fully to elicit the truth, is in no manner necessary. The court is competent of itself to perform the duties imposed upon it, and will now proceed to execute that task.

Captain Porter was then asked whether he had any questions to propose to Lieutenant Platt. He declined putting any, and observed he should now take his leave of the court.

Alexander J. Dallas, a master and commander in the navy of the United States, being produced as a witness, and sworn according to law, deposes and says:

I was a master commandant in command of the John Adams, bearing Commodore Porter's broad pendant. We arrived sometime in November, I do not distinctly remember the date, off the town of St. Thomas, in the Island of St. Thomas. On our arrival there, some time I think in the afternoon of the same day, Lieutenant Platt, in company with Mr. Cabot, came on board the John Adams, and made a report to the commodore of some ill-treatment which Lieutenant Platt had received at Foxardo. In consequence of this report, I understood from the commodore that it was his intention to visit Foxardo, and endeavor to obtain an apology from the authorities there for their conduct. On the following morning, I was directed to get the John Adams under way, and proceed to Foxardo.

In consequence of the lightness of the winds, and the pilot being of opinion that the draft of water of the John Adams was too great to permit her being taken near the town, I was directed to anchor her under one of the Passage Islands, to get out all my boats, and prepare a hundred and odd men with the officers. After all these preparations were made, the day had so far advanced that we could not have arrived there before night. In consequence of which, the commodore directed that we should be ready by one or two in the morning to go on board the schooner Grampus, she and the Beagle being in company; we did so, and the Grampus took our boats in tow. We then proceeded to Foxardo, where we arrived about nine or ten the next morning. On anchoring, we observed, on a hill, near the beach, a small battery, in which there appeared to be a number of men, who it was supposed intended to make some resistance to our anchoring. An order was given by the commodore that a boat and her crew should dislodge the men from that battery. The boats were then all manned, and we landed. The commodore then directed Lieutenant Crabbe, with a portion of the marines, to advance and take a position on the road, by which we were to march up to the town. Lieutenant Stribling was then dispatched with a flag and a letter to the authorities of Foxardo; after having formed the men, we were directed to follow on by the road, leaving a guard of marines to protect the boats under the command of Lieutenant Barton. We then marched to within about twenty or thirty yards of where the marines under the command of Lieutenant Crabbe were. The commodore directed two guns, which we met with on the road, to be spiked. We remained there until Lieutenant Stribling returnd with two officers, who were understood to be the alcalde and the captain of the port. A conversation took place between the commodore and the alcalde, through the medium of an interpreter; the result of which was an apology to Lieutenant Platt for the ill-treatment he had received on his previous visit. The commodore asked the officers generally, if they were satisfied with the apology. Finding they were so, he directed our return. He received, however, an invitation to go himself into the town.

He went as far as led us by all the force that was collected: a field piece and sixty or seventy men with arms. After this we returned to the beach, where, some rum and refreshments being given to the men, we embarked in the boats, went on board the Grampus, and sailed for the John Adams.

Question. Had you received any information on board the John Adams of Mr. Platt's treatment at Foxardo, previous to his making the report of the transaction to the commodore?

Answer. The account Mr. Platt gave was, I believe, the first we had of the affair.

Ques. Was any communication made to the authorities of Porto Rico previously to your entering the harbor of Foxardo?

Ans. None that I know of.

Ques. Did Captain Porter consult with any of his officers as to the expedition he projected, or did any of them express any opinion to him on the subject?

Ans. He did not consult with any of them; from the intimacy that subsisted between Commodore Porter and myself, I believe I made some remarks to him as to the consequences that might probably result from it, and I think he replied that his instructions would bear him out in the course he intended to pursue on the occasion.

This was a voluntary suggestion by me, not called for by his expressing any wish to consult me.

Ques. What orders did you receive from Captain Porter previous to, or at the time of your landing?

Ans. The only orders that I received were those which I have mentioned, and that I should take care the men were not out of the way, and that they committed no excesses.

Ques. How were the men armed? Were the guns loaded?

Ans. They were armed with muskets, bayonets, cutlasses, pistols, and boarding pikes. The guns were loaded on the beach before we marched up.

Ques. Was any flag or communication sent to the shore before you landed?

Ans. None; Lieutenant Stribling landed with us. The boat sent to spike the guns on the hill went previously to our landing.

Ques. Did you advance towards Foxardo before the return of the flag sent by Lieutenant Stribling, or did you remain on the beach till his return?

Ans. We advanced before the return of the flag.

Ques. Were the guns spiked before the return of the flag?

Ans. Yes; none were spiked after.

Ques. What orders were given by Commodore Porter to the officers remaining on board the vessels?

Ans. I do not know.

Ques. Were the Grampus and Beagle anchored in such a situation as to enable them to cover the landing?

Ans. Yes; the Beagle certainly was—the Grampus also.

Ques. Was any opposition offered to your landing, or to your advance towards the town?

Ans. None; the impression was, the force on the hill would, had they been able, have fired on the vessels, but there was no opposition to our landing.

Ques. What time would it have required to communicate from your anchorage with St. John's?

Ans. The distance, I should presume, is about forty or fifty miles.

Ques. Is not St. Johns the seat of government of Porto Rico?

Ans. Yes; the governor of the island resides there.

Horatio N. Crabbe, a lieutenant in the marine corps of the United States, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

I was commanding officer of marines on board the John Adams in November last. I landed at Foxardo in the same boat with Lieuenant Stribling, and on getting on the beach, an officer informed me that Commodore Porter, who had previously landed, wished to see me. My command was distributed in different boats. On reaching the place on the beach were the commodore was, I was directed by him to form my guard, look for the road to the town, proceed, and take up a favorable position; and at the same time received very particular instructions not to suffer my men to commit any outrages upon the property of the inhabitants along the road; nor to commit any act of hostility myself, unless I met with resistance, or was opposed on my march towards the town. After receiving these instructions, I commenced my march towards the town, with from twenty-four to twenty-eight men, armed with muskets. When about half way between the beach and the town, I discovered several persons approaching me, following me with a white flag. I could not at the time distinguish who they were, and continued my march. After a short time I discovered that the bearer was Lieutenant Stribling, on his way from the beach to the town. I halted till he came up. As he passed me, I observed to him that I would escort him into the place; he answered very well. After proceeding a short distance further, he was met by a number of persons from the town, bearing a white flag also. I was at that time from twenty to thirty yards behind him. Immediately on his reaching the spot where these persons were standing, I observed that Lieutenant Stribling was surrounded by a number of armed men. After some conversation with them, of which I knew nothing, he sent a message to me, requesting me not to advance any further. I accordingly halted the men, and rested them upon their arms. I was at this time from about two hundred and fifty to three hundred yards from the town, perhaps less, and observed that there was a number of armed men drawn up, as I presumed, to prevent my troops from entering the place. They amounted perhaps to about three times as many men as I had, and had a field piece, which I presumed was a six pounder. There was also a number of men mounted on horseback, who were armed with swords. They were at the entrance of the town. I remained in the position I had taken up, until the commodore came up with a body of seamen. He halted them some distance in the rear of my division, and came himself to the ground I occupied, and directed me to wheel my men into a position which would face the Spaniards. I did so, and again rested them upon their arms. In the course of perhaps fifteen minutes, Lieutenant Stribling was observed returning, accompanied by the governor of the place, and a small number of the inhabitants. I was then directed by Commodore Porter to place my men in a situation that would occupy both sides of the road, and suffer none but those in attendance on the flag to pass me. After this he returned to where the officers were assembled, some distance in the rear of the marines, and there received the governor or alcalde. I know nothing of what occurred there, they being at too great a distance to hear. In a short time I observed the governor, with Commodore Porter and a number of the officers, approaching me. The commodore gave me orders, as he passed, to put the marines in motion, and follow him into the town, which I did. After passing the armed Spaniards, I halted upon the outskirts of the place. The commodore observed to me that he had been invited into the place by the governor, and also the men, to take some refreshments, after the march, but said at the same time that he did not wish to bring all the men in, as he apprehended that some excesses might be committed, which would put an end to the peaceable settlement of the business. He, however, told the governor, through the intepreter, that if refreshments were sent to the beach they should be paid for. After that they parted, as I thought on friendly terms, and we left the town, and returned to the boats. I brought up the rear with the marines. A number of the inhabitants accompanied us down. Refreshments were sent and distributed to the men. We then embarked, and returned to the vessels. Commodore Porter, with the marines, and the alcalde, entered the outskirts of the place, but none proceeded further.

The court adjourned till 2 o'clock to-morrow.

FRIDAY, May 6.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: as before, with the exception of Captain Porter, who was not present.

Lieutenant Platt was again called:

Question. How far is the place where the John Adams was left at anchor from Foxardo?

Answer. About twenty-two miles.

Ques. At what hour did you leave the John Adams, and at what hour did you arrive at Foxardo?

Ans. We left the John Adams at midnight, and arrived at half-past seven or half-past eight.

Ques. To what nation does the Island of St. Thomas belong?

Ans. It is a Danish island.

Ques. When you left the John Adams, at what time did you calculate to reach Foxardo?

Ans. The intention of the commodore was to reach Foxardo at sunrise, as he informed me; we were detained by light winds, and a calm.

Ques. Were the two nine-pounders taken and spiked by the marines, or by the sailors who came up afterwards? and describe as nearly as you can their position.

Ans. I was ordered by the commodore to spike them; I informed him I had nothing to spike them with, and Mr. Pendergrast was then ordered to do it; the marines had passed them. They were placed in the road, on a causeway, where the road was straight for about one hundred rods, and commanded that part of it; there were no Spaniards there at that time, they had abandoned them; but they had been manned on my first visit to the place. The guns on the hill were, I understood, long eighteen-pounders.

Ques. Were both the Grampus and Beagle anchored in a position to cover the landing?

Ans. The Grampus was anchored off the battery; the Beagle in a situation to cover the landing.

The judge advocate informed the court that he should probably be in possession of more testimony to submit to-morrow, but had none to lay before the court at this time.

The court adjourned till twelve o'clock, to-morrow.

SATURDAY, May 7.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court, the judge advocate, and Captain Porter. The judge advocate informed the court that he had received a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, to be submitted to the court, which was read, annexed to the record, and marked G.

The accompanying documents were also read; the court reserving all questions, as to their competency and credit, for future deliberation and decision. After reading the papers, the court was cleared, and the court proceeded to deliberate upon the papers submitted to it; and, after having maturely considered the same, the court was opened, and the judge advocate stated that the court is of opinion that the deposition of Lieut. Barton, dated February 6th, 1825, be annexed to the record, which is accordingly done, and the paper is marked 7.

In regard to the other documents, the court is of opinion that many of them are not sufficiently authenticated to authorize their reception, without an express and sufficient waiver of all exceptions entered on the record; that some of them appear to be of a confidential character, and their contents such as, without affecting this case, ought not to be exposed to the public eye without necessity; and that, collectively, they present no facts or views calculated to elucidate the subject submitted to the court. The court, therefore, directs the judge advocate to return them to the Navy Department, as irrelevant.*

The court adjourned till half-past ten o'clock on Monday morning.

MONDAY, May 9.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of Saturday. Present: all the members of the court, the judge advocate, and Captain Porter.

The judge advocate stated to the court that he had no further testimony to submit to the court in the investigation; and the other branch of inquiry having been submitted to the court, at his solicitation

The court was cleared, and proceeded to deliberate upon the course to be pursued; and after some time was opened, and the judge advocate stated that the court had determined to proceed to complete the business which had already been investigated, and to report to the Department the facts which have been proved in relation to it.

The record of the proceedings was then read by the judge advocate, and the court was cleared, for the purpose of deliberating upon the report to be made to the Department.

The court having concluded the examination of the witnesses, and having maturely deliberated on the precept, and the evidence which has been submitted, agree in the following report:

The court, in obedience to the precept of the honorable the Secretary of the Navy, having examined into the conduct of Captain David Porter, in landing with a part of the military force under his command upon the Island of Porto Rico, a part of the dominions of his Catholic Majesty the King of Spain, on or about the fourteenth day of November, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four; and having also inquired into the causes which led to the same; and having maturely deliberated upon the testimony which has been laid before the court, reports to the honorable the Secretary the following statement, as containing a correct history of the transaction, embracing all the material facts, and exhibiting the causes which led to the occurrence, as well as the circumstances which attended it.

It appears that Lieut. Charles T. Platt, commanding the United States schooner Beagle, was in the harbor of St. Thomas, in the Danish island of that name, on the twenty-fourth day of October, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four. On the preceding night, a robbery had been perpetrated in the city of St. Thomas; the store of Messrs. Cabot & Baily, American citizens, but resident merchants of St. Thomas, had been broken open and plundered of property to a large amount. The gentlemen who had suffered by this outrage made application to Lieut. Platt for his aid in the recovery of the property. He immediately agreed to comply with the request.

*It appears by the statement of Captain Porter, as well as of his clerk, that the letter from him referred to in the letter, was dated March 6th, instead of May 6th, by a mistake of the clerk. R. S. COXE, Judge Advocate.

No communication appears to have been had between Lieutenant Platt and the authorities of St. Thomas, in relation to this affair. The application for his assistance was made by private individuals, and upon that application alone he acted.

Information was given to Lieut. Platt, that on other occasions robberies of the same kind had occurred at St. Thomas; and the stolen goods had been traced to, and discovered at Foxardo, (a small town in the Island of Porto Rico,) or its vicinity, and that there existed grounds for the suspicion that the goods plundered in this case had been carried to that neighborhood.

As soon as the Beagle could be got ready, she sailed for that place. No document of any kind from the governor, or other officer, was carried, but a letter from a private mercantile house at St. Thomas, addressed to a private merchant at Foxardo, was the only paper which Lieut. Platt appears to have had to show the object he had in view, or any authority to act in the business. The contents of that letter are unknown to the court, it not having been exhibited in evidence. The Beagle, however, carried from St. Thomas a Mr. Bedford, a clerk in the house of Messrs. Baily and Cabot, for the purpose of identifying the goods, and a pilot, furnished by the same parties.

On the evening of the 26th October, about 6 o'clock, the Beagle anchored, with her colors flying, in the harbor of Foxardo. It was considered too late to visit the shore on that day; early in the morning of the 27th, a boat from the shore came on board, bearing a messenger from the captain of the port, and Lieut. Platt received an invitation to land. The messenger, in answer to a question from Lieut. Platt, stated in general, that he knew what vessel it was. In order to guard against any mistake, Lieut. Platt mentioned that it was the United States schooner Beagle, and sent a message to the captain of the port, to inform him that he should be on shore as soon as possible.

At about half-past six he landed, without his uniform or commission, and after some little interruption proceeded to the town, and waited upon the captain of the port, to whom he communicated the object of his visit. He at the same time informed him of the name and character of his vessel, the names of himself and officers, and their force, of which the captain of the port took a memorandum; the private letter from the mercantile house at St. Thomas to the merchant at Foxardo was likewise produced and exhibited. The captain of the port appeared satisfied with the information, and by his directions Lieutenant Platt next called upon the alcalde of the place, to whom he made the same communication. The alcalde expressed himself pleased with the prudence exhibited by Lieut. Platt in landing in the dress of a citizen,

The object of Lieutenant Platt appears to have been to give information of the robbery that had been perpetrated at the Island of St. Thomas, and to solicit the interference of the civil authorities at Foxardo, in searching for and recovering the stolen goods. The alcalde promised this assistance as requested, but declined a proposal made by Lieutenant Platt, that he should accompany the officers of the police to search the stores in the town.

Lieutenant Platt left the house of the alcalde, and went to a public house. Shortly after breakfast, he received a message from the alcalde, expressing a wish to see him. He immediately went, accompanied by Lieutenant Ritchie and the pilot. On his arrival, he inquired of the alcalde whether he had sent for him, and for what object. The captain of the port replied that he had sent for him for the purpose of demanding his register. Lieutenant Platt stated to them that he had no register, that a man-of-war carried no such document; that he had previously offered to show his commission, his uniform, and his colors. The reply was, that, unless he produced his register at once, he should be imprisoned. He requested permission to go on board his vessel, with an officer that might be selected to accompany him, whom he would satisfy with regard to his own character, as well as that of his vessel. He at the same time informed them he should make a formal report to Commodore Porter of the insult he had received.

Lieutenant Platt then left the house of the alcalde, and proceeded towards the harbor, with the intention of going on board the Beagle; he was, however, immediately followed by some soldiers, collared, arrested, brought back, and placed under charge of a sentry. After Lieutenants Platt and Ritchie and the pilot had been detained about an hour, Mr. Bedford, the clerk brought from St. Thomas, was permitted to go on board the Beagle, with instructions from Lieutenant Platt to bring his commission and uniform, On their being brought to him, he put on his uniform and exhibited his commission; the latter, after an examination of it, was pronounced a forgery, and he himself called a damned pirate.

Orders were then given to carry him to the King's house or jail; and he was taken from the house of the alcalde for that purpose. On approaching near enough to see what kind of a place it was, he refused to go in, and declared that he would not enter, unless compelled by force.

He was soon taken back to the alcalde, and after being threatened with detention until a communication could be made to St. John's, the capital of the island, and about 40 miles distant, he was informed that he had not exhibited any appointment to the vessel which he commanded. He sent on board for his orders, and after producing them, a consultation was held. They continued to detain him confined until near sunset, when he was released, ordered to go on board his vessel, which he did, insulted by the rabble of the place as he passed along.

Such is the summary of the statement now given by Lieutenant Platt of his first visit to Foxardo, and the reception he experienced, although more detailed than his written report, and in some material parts variant from it. It appears to the court that the circumstances which were related to Captain Porter, in the conversations which he had with Lieutenant Platt, together with his written report, may be considered as embracing all "the causes which led to the conduct of Captain Porter," which it is enjoined upon the court to report to the Department.

The next branch of the subject into which the court is directed to inquire, is the conduct of Captain Porter in landing with a military force under his command upon the Island of Porto Rico.

It appears that, immediately after receiving the report of Lieutenant Platt of his visit to Foxardo, and the treatment he had there received, Captain Porter determined to visit that place for the purpose of obtaining redress for the violence which had been offered to the person of that officer, and the insult which he conceived had been given to the flag of the United States.

It appears that Captain Porter did not communicate with the constituted authorities of Porto Rico, or require any explanation of, or apology for, the alleged outrage, before proceeding to the harbor of Foxardo.

At midnight of the 13th November, the John Adams was left at her anchorage in the neighborhood of Passage Island, and Captain Porter, in the Grampus, having in tow the boats of the John Adams, and accompanied by the Beagle, carrying with them about one hundred men from the John Adams, proceeds to Foxardo. His progress being delayed by light winds and a calm, he did not reach his point of destination until about 8 or 9 o'clock in the morning of the 14th. The Grampus anchored opposite a battery of two guns, and the Beagle took a position to cover the landing. Preparations were immediately made to land, and the boats were manned; a battery was perceived on an eminence near the beach, in which were two pieces of cannon, and the Spaniards were seen with matches, and in the act of loading the guns, and training them in the direction of the Grampus.

Lieutenant Pendergrast was ordered to take the launch of the Grampus, being the largest boat, with a body of marines, fourteen in number, under the command of Lieutenant Barton, to proceed in the direction of the two gun battery; to land the men with as little hazard as possible; to take the battery, spike the guns, and destroy the ammunition; and having accomplished these objects, to pursue the direction of the main body under the command of Captain Porter in person.

Lieutenant Pendergrast was particularly ordered not to fire a gun, unless he met with resistance, and not to permit his men to commit any depredations on persons or property. These orders appear to have been punctually obeyed. Perceiving that the Spaniards in the battery were training their guns to bear upon the Grampus and the launch, Lieutenant Pendergrast hastened to effect a landing in the rear of the fort. This was accomplished with such dispatch, that the Spaniards were unable to fire. Having succeeded in landing in the rear of the battery, the detachment, armed with muskets, pistols and cutlasses, mounted the hill, and on reaching the battery, found it deserted by the Spaniards. Possession was quietly taken, and two long eighteen-pounders found there were spiked. One of the guns was charged with a cartridge of powder, and round shot, and the canister filled with grape shot, musket balls and spikes;—the gun primed and a lighted match near it. The other gun had been abandoned before the loading was completed. A small quantity of ammunition found in the battery was destroyed;—the party re-embarked, and proceeded to join the commodore, who had in the meantime landed on the beach at the distance of about half a mile from the battery.

The whole number landed appears to be about two hundred officers and men, armed with muskets, bayonets, pistols, cutlasses, and boarding pikes.

The muskets were loaded after landing on the beach. The marines, under Lieutenant Barton, were left to guard the boats. Another party of them was ordered by Captain Porter to march towards the town, and take up a commanding position. The officer who led them, Lieutenant Crabbe, was particularly instructed to keep his men in their respective places; to prevent them from committing any excesses upon the property of the inhabitants along the road, and to abstain from all acts of hostility, unless he should be attacked, or his advance towards the town should be opposed.

In obedience to these orders, Lieutenant Crabbe proceeded towards the village of Foxardo, with from twenty-four to twenty-eight men under his command. The beach where the landing was effected, was about a mile and a half from the town. When about half way from the beach, Lieutenant Crabbe discovered Lieutenant Stribling following him bearing a white flag. As soon as he had approached near enough to be recognized, the marines were halted. Lieutenant Stribling came up with, passed them, and proceeded towards the town. The marines followed at a short distance in his rear. Lieutenant Stribling was soon after met by a party from the village, likewise bearing a flag, and some cummunications passed between them, which, however, are not in evidence before the court. Lieutenant Stribling dispatched a message to Lieutenant Crabbe, then about thirty or forty yards in his rear, desiring him not to advance further. The marines were then halted at about from two hundred and fifty to three hundred yards from the village. About the same time a number of armed men, perhaps sixty or seventy, were seen, stationed near the entrance of the town, with a small cannon, supposed to be a six pounder, and a number of horsemen armed with swords.

Having disposed of the marines in the manner that has been stated, Captain Porter advanced towards Foxardo with his main body. On the way up, they spiked two nine-pounders which the Spaniards had abandoned, and which were in a position to have commanded a part of the road. These guns had been passed by the marines without their taking possession of them. Captain Porter continued his march till he arrived about thirty yards in the rear of the marines, where he halted his men—and advanced himself to the force under the command of Lieutenant Crabbe. The marines were then wheeled so as to front the Spaniards.

In the course of a few minutes, the flag was seen returning from the town, and Lieutenant Stribling, accompanied by the alcalde, the captain of the port, and some of the inhabitants, approached. The marines were directed to occupy both sides of the road, and to permit none to pass, excepting those who were in attendance on the flag. Captain Porter retired to the rear, near the main body, and, accompanied by his officers, received the alcalde.

In the conversation which then took place, the alcalde admitted having detained Lieutenant Platt, after knowing him to be an American officer, but alleged that he had been forced to act by others. Captain Porter informed him that he alone must be held responsible, and that he must make such an apology as should be dictated; that the period allowed him for deliberation had nearly expired; that but five or seven minutes remained of the time. That a refusal to make such an apology as was required, would compel him to resort to arms—the consequences of which would be the destruction of the village. The proposition was acceded to: the apology was dictated by Captain Porter, and made as required. The officers present were asked whether they were satisfied, and replied in the affirmative.

The alcade then invited Captain Porter into the town with some of his officers, and Lieutenant Crabbe and his marines; he accompanied the Spaniards towards the village, but did not go beyond the outskirts—when they returned to the beach, where they were supplied with refreshments by the Spaniards, re-embarked, and proceeded to join the John Adams.

The foregoing statement, embracing, as the court conceives, every important fact disclosed in the progress of this investigation, is respectfully submitted.

MAY 9, 1825.

The report having been signed, the judge advocate was instructed to communicate the record to the Secretary of the Navy, with the accompanying letter, annexed to the record and marked H.

The court adjourned till 11 o'clock, to-morrow morning.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, Passage Island, November 15, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that, on my arrival at St. Thomas, I was informed that Lieutenant Commandant Platt, of the U. S. schooner Beagle, who had visited Foxardo, a town on the east side of Porto Rico, about two miles from the sea, for the purpose of making inquiries respecting a quantity of dry goods, supposed to have been deposited there by pirates, was, after being recognized as an American officer by the proper authorities, there imprisoned and shamefully treated.

Indignant at the outrages which have so repeatedly been heaped on us by the authorities of Porto Rico, I proceeded to this place, where I left the ship, and taking with me the schooners Grampus and Beagle, and the boats of the John Adams with Captain Dallas and part of his officers, seamen, and marines, proceeded to the port of Foxardo, where, finding preparations were making to fire on us from the battery on shore, I sent a party of seamen and marines to spike the guns, which was done in a few minutes, as the Spaniards fled on the landing of the party. I then landed with two hundred men, and marched to the town, spiking on the way the guns of a small battery placed for the defence of a pass on the road, and reached the town in about thirty minutes after landing; I found them prepared for defence, as they had received information from St. Thomas of my intentions of visiting the place. I halted about pistol shot from their forces, drawn up on the outskirts of the town, and sent a flag, requiring the alcalde or governor, with the captain of the port, the principal offenders, to come to me to make atonement for the outrage, giving them one hour to deliberate. They appeared accordingly, and after begging pardon (in the presence of all the officers) of the officer who had been insulted, and expressing great penitence, I permitted them to return to the town, on their promising to respect all American officers who may visit them hereafter. We then returned to the vessels, and left the harbor, after being at anchor three hours.

As we were getting under way, a number of persons appeared on the beach, bearing a white flag, and having with them some bullocks and a number of horses apparently laden, no doubt a present from the authorities of the place, which they informed me they should send me.

There is no doubt that our persons and our flag will be more respected hereafter, than it has been by the authorities of Porto Rico.

Every officer and man on this occasion, conducted themselves in a manner to meet my entire approbation.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

ST. THOMAS, November 12, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the store of Cabot, Baily & Co. was broken open on the night of the 24th ult., and property to a considerable amount stolen, and having strong reasons to believe that the robbery was committed by a gang of thieves who harbored in the Island of Porto Rico, I communicated the same to Captain Platt, of the United States schooner Beagle, who very promptly offered to go there in pursuit of them, and started for Foxardo on the morning of the 25th with a pilot which I furnished him, and a young man from the counting house, with a description of the goods, and a letter of introduction to Mr. Juan Campos, from one of the most respectable houses in this place, and well known in that quarter. The manner in which Captain Platt was received and treated has no doubt been communicated to you by him.

I beg leave to enclose a letter from Messrs. Bergeest and Whlhorn, confirming the facts of the late robberies in this island, having in most instances been traced to the quarter of Porto Rico where Captain Platt went.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant, (Signed) STEPHEN CABOT, U. S. Consular Agent.

To Com. DAVID PORTER.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 2, 1825.

I certify that the foregoing is a correct copy of an enclosure contained in a letter from Commodore D. Porter to the Secretary of the Navy, dated 1st January, 1825.

No. 4.

St. Thomas, November 11, 1824.

Sir: At the request of our friend, Mr. Stephen Cabot, we beg leave to state to you some facts relative to the robberies lately committed on this island.

Our own store, and amongst others, those of our neighbors, Messrs. Ellis, Gibson & Co., John Kettle, Esq., Robert Alexander, Esq., Saubot Zoubert & Co., were forcibly broken open, property to a very large amount stolen, and a considerable part of the goods traced to Naguabo, near Foxardo; in consequence of which, and the circumstance that, about ten days previous to the robbery committed in the store of Messrs. Cabot, Baily & Co., a gang of desperate thieves made their escape from the prison of the city at Porto Rico, as also that every search had been made here on shore, as well as in the harbor, and nothing discovered, except that the goods stolen had been carried off by the sea side, induced us to recommend to those gentlemen sending down a person to Foxardo, as being probably the means of tracing the robbers.

Desirous of assisting our friends, Messrs. Cabot, Baily, & Co., in this object, we gave one of their clerks, and whom we understood was to go down in the United States schooner Beagle, a letter of recommendation to our friend, Mr. Juan Campos, in Foxardo, who had on former occasions of the same nature been the means of discovering the property and perpetrators; namely, in the case of Messrs. Ellis, Gibson & Co., and our own.

We have the honor to be, with sentiments of the highest regard, sir, your obedient, humble servants,

United States Schooner Beagle, St. Thomas, November 11, 1824.

Sir: At 10 in the morning of the 26th October last, I received intelligence th t the American consul's store had been forciby entered on the preceding night, and robbed of goods to the amount of $5,000. With this report, the American consul requested me, provided it would prove consistent with my duties, to sail in quest of those whom it was supposed had clandestinely left the harbor the night preceding in a small boat, and generally believed by those acquainted in St. Thomas, to have proceeded to the port of Foxardo, on the east end of Porto Rico. I directly gave the necessary orders to prepare for sea; having received a good pilot on board, I was enabled by noon to proceed in quest of the marauders.

Standing along the south side of Crabb Island, I discovered a sloop in Settlement Bay; boarded her, and received information of a piratical sloop-rigged boat to leeward, that had been for some time past infesting the coast. This information induced me to alter my course, and steer for the west end of Crabb Island. At 10 A. M. discovered a sloop beating to windward, and the small sloop-rigged boat standing from the land; at 10.50 fired a shot to bring the sloop to; at 10.55 fired again; she hove about and stood for the land; spoke the sloop from St. Croix, bound to St. Thomas; made all sail for the sloop boat which run into ——— Bay, and her crew abandoned her. At 11.50 came to, and took possession of the deserted boat; at 11.55 made sail, and stood for the southeast end of Porto Rico; at sunset, came to in the harbor of Foxardo.

On the morning of the 27th, a creole visited me from the shore, who bore an invitation from the commandant to me to visit him. At 7 A. M., in company with Lieutenant Ritchie, the pilot, and the consul's clerk, I landed. For our better success, we appeared in the character of citizens; on my reaching the shore, the register of my vessel was demanded; I explained the object of my visit, and the policy of appearing in disguise. This, however, proved of no avail—I was not allowed to proceed to Foxardo. Supposing that the person who made these demands had no authority to detain me, I, in company with Lieutenant Ritchie, proceeded to the port of Foxardo, and explained, in the most satisfactory manner, to the captain of the port, the object of my visit, and produced a private letter from Mr. Cabot, American consul, to a merchant in that place, in relation to the service in which we were engaged.

Having observed the necessary forms and ceremonies with regard to the captain of the port, we then waited upon the alcalde, and further acquainted him with our mission, &c., who proffered us every assistance. Having made a few inquiries in some of the retail stores, which had an immediate tendency to bring to light any who may have been engaged in this traffic, we received a positive order to proceed to the alcalde's house, where we were also received by the captain of the port, who damned us as pirates, and requested of me register, papers, &c. I stated I possessed no register; I carried no papers, other than my commission, and that of my officers; we were seized as culprits, and conveyed to prison. To satisfy them of my real character, of which they pretended they had no positive proof, I consented, though repugnant to my feelings, to have my commission sent me. After its production, they declared it a forgery, and again remanded us to prison, declaring he would not release us until he had heard from St. John's. I then demanded to know what was further required; the reply was, "Your appointment as lieutenant commandant of that vessel is what you must produce."

I at first hesitated, and would not comply; but not wishing on my part to commit any action which might have a tendency to disturb the harmony existing between our respective governments, I produced my appointment as lieutenant commandant. A council of officers was called, with other citizens of the place, who, after having heaped upon us the most shameful outrages, permitted us to depart on board.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHARLES T. PLATT.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, February 1, 1823.

SIR: You have been appointed to the command of a squadron fitted out under an act of Congress of the 20th December last, to cruise in the West India seas and Gulf of Mexico, for the purpose of suppressing piracy, and affording effectual protection to the citizens and commerce of the United States. Your attention will also be extended to the suppression of the slave trade, according to the provisions of the several acts of Congress on that subject; copies of which, and of the instructions heretofore given to our naval commanders thereon, are herewith sent to you. While it is your duty to protect our commerce against all unlawful interruption, and to guard the rights, both of person and property, of the citizens of the United States, wherever it shall become necessary, you will observe the utmost caution not to encroach upon the rights of others; and should you at any time be brought into discussion or collision with any foreign power, in relation to such rights, it will be expedient and proper, that the same should be conducted with as much moderation and forbearance, as is consistent with the honor of your country, and the just claims of its citizens.

Should you in your cruise, fall in with any foreign naval force, engaged in the suppression of piracy, it is desirable that harmony and a good understanding should be cultivated between you; and you will do everything on your part, that accords with the honor of the American flag, to promote this object. So soon as the vessels at Norfolk shall be ready for sea, you will proceed to the West Indies, by such route as you shall judge best, for the purpose of effecting the object of your cruise. You will establish at Thompson's Island, usually called Key West, a depot, and land the ordnance and marines to protect the stores and provisions; if, however, you shall find any important objection to this place, and a more suitable and convenient one can be found, you are at liberty to select it as a depot.

You will announce your arrival and object to the authorities, civil and military, of the Island of Cuba, and endeaver to obtain, as far as shall be practicable, their co-operation; or at least their favorable and friendly support, giving them the most unequivocal assurance, that your sole object is the destruction of pirates.

The system of piracy, which has grown up in the West Indies, has obviously arisen from the war between Spain and the new governments, her late provinces in that hemisphere, and from the limited force in the islands, and their sparse population, many portions of each being entirely uninhabited and desolate, to which the active authority of the government does not extend. It is understood that establishments have been made by parties of these banditti, in those uninhabited parts, to which they carry their plunder, and retreat in time of danger. It cannot be presumed that the government of any island will afford any protection or countenance to such robbers. It may, on the contrary, confidently be believed that all governments, and particularly those most exposed, will afford all means in their power for their suppression.

Pirates are considered, by the law of nations, the enemies of the human race. It is the duty of all nations to put them down; and none who respect their own character or interest will refuse to do it, much less afford them assistance and protection. The nation that makes the greatest exertions to suppress such banditti, has the greatest merit.

In making such exertions, it has a right to the aid of every other power, to the extent of its means, and to the enjoyment, under its sanction, of all its rights in the pursuit of the object. In the case of belligerents, where the army of one party enters the territory of a neutral power, the army of the other has a right to follow it there. In the case of pirates, the right of the armed force of one power, to follow them into the territory of the other, is more complete. In regard to pirates, there is no neutral party; they being the enemies of the human race, all nations are parties against them, and may be considered as allies. The object and intention of our government is to respect the feelings, as well as the rights of others, both in substance and in form, in all the measures which may be adopted to accomplish the end in view. Should, therefore, the crews of any vessels which you have seen engaged in acts of piracy, or which you have just cause to suspect of being of that c aracter, retreat into the ports, harbors, or settled parts of the islands, you may enter, in pursuit of them, such ports, harbors, and settled parts of the country, for the purpose of aiding the local authorities, or people, as the case may be, to seize and bring the offenders to justice, previously giving notice that this is your sole object. Where the government exists, and is felt, you will in all instances respect the local authorities, and only act in aid of, and co-operation with them; it being the exclusive purpose of the government of the United States to suppress piracy; an object in which all nations are equally interested; and in the accomplishment of which, the Spanish authorities and people will, it is presumed, cordially co-operate with you.

If, in the pursui of pirates found at sea, they shall retreat into the unsettled parts of the islands, or foreign territory, you are at liberty to pursue them so long, only, as there is reasonable prospect of being able to apprehend them, and in no case are you at liberty to pursue and apprehend any one after having been forbidden so to do, by competent authority of the local government. And should you on such pursuit apprehend any pirates upon land, you will deliver them over to the proper authority, to be dealt with according to law, and you will furnish such evidence as shall be in your power to prove the offence alleged against them. Should the local authorities refuse to receive and prosecute such persons so apprehended, on your furnishing them with reasonable evidence of their guilt, you will then keep them safely and securely, on board some of the vessels under your command, and report without delay to this Department the particular circumstances of such cases. Great complaints are made of the interruption and injury to our commerce, by privateers fitted out from Spanish ports. You will endeavor to obtain from the Spanish authorities a list of the vessels so commissioned, and ascertain how far they have been instructed to intercept our trade with Mexico and the Colombian republic; impressing upon them, that, according to the well settled rule of the law of nations, the United States will not consider any portion of coast upon the Gulf of Mexico, as legally blockaded, except where a naval force is stationed, sufficient to carry into effect the blockading order or decree; and that this government does not recognize the right or authority of Spain to interdict or interrupt our commerce with any portion of the coast included within the Columbian republic or Mexican government, not actually blockaded by a competent force.

All the United States ships and vessels of war in the West Indies, of which a list is herewith enclosed, are placed under your command, and you will distribute them to such stations as shall appear to you best calculated to afford complete protection to our commerce, in which you will embrace the object of protecting the convoy of specie from Vera Cruz, and the Mexican coast generally, to the United States. Keep one vessel at least upon this service, to be at, or near, Vera Cruz during the healthy season of the year, and to be relieved as occasion shall require, both for convoy of trade, and to bring specie to the United States—confining the transportation to the United States only. You will be particularly watchful to preserve the health of the officers and crew under your command, and to guard, in every possible manner, against the unhealthiness of the climate; not permitting any intercourse with the shore where the yellow fever prevails, except in cases of absolute necessity.

Wishing you good health, and a successful cruise, I am, very respectfully, &c.

MARINE BARRACKS, Allenton, Thompson's Island, February 6, 1825.

I, Thomas B. Barton, first lieutenant of marines in the service of the United States, and commanding the marines on this station, do make the following statement of facts, in relation to the proceedings of Commodore David Porter, commander-in-chief of the naval forces of the United States, in the West Indies, &c., at Foxardo, in the Island of Porto Rico, in the month of November, 1824.

The United States schooner Grampus, bearing the broad pendant of Commodore Porter, with the United States schooner Beagle in company, arrived in the harbor of Foxardo on the 14th November, 1824, about 8 o'clock, A. M. I was a passenger in the Grampus. Both vessels entered the harbor with the United States ensign displayed. We had scarcely let go our anchor, which was done directly opposite a two gun battery on the summit of a hill, elevated perhaps eighty feet above the level of the ocean, when I perceived twenty or more men in the battery, loading and training the guns in the direction of the Grampus. I soon after received orders through Lieutenant Sloat, commander of the schooner, to be in readiness to command the marine guard attached to her, fourteen in number, and to proceed in the launch, the largest boat of the Grampus, with Lieutenant Pendergrast, her first lieutenant.

The latter officer received the following orders, in substance, from Commodore Porter, in my presence: To proceed in the direction of the two gun battery, directly opposite, and land the men under his command at as little hazard as possible. To take the battery, spike the guns, and destroy the ammunition; and then pursue the direction of the main body under the command of the commodore in person. Lieutenant Pendergrast was particularly ordered not to fire a gun, unless he met with resistance; and not to permit the men to commit any depredation upon persons or property.

We then pulled off from the Grampus, in a direction for the battery, and perceiving that they were training their guns, one to bear on the Grampus, and one on our launch, we made the best of our way to effect a landing in the rear of the fort, which we succeeded in doing in so short a space of time, that they could not bring the gun to bear on us, which they were using every exertion to do.

Having succeeded in landing in rear of the battery, we mounted the hill with muskets, pistols, and cutlasses, and discovered the works to be that moment deserted by the Spaniards. We took quiet possession, and found two long eighteen pounders, one of them charged with a cartridge of powder and round shot, and a canister filled with grape shot, musket balls, and spikes, the gun primed, and a lighted match placed near it. The other gun was partly charged, but was deserted before the loading of her was completed.

Agreeably to orders, we spiked the guns with files; and finding one or two charges of powder, and a canister with grape, musket balls, and spikes, alongside one of the guns, the ammunition was destroyed.

After having secured the battery conformably to orders, we re-embarked in our launch, and proceeded to the direction of the main body, which had landed near the road leading to the town of Foxardo.

After we reached the landing, I was ordered by Commodore Porter to remain with a guard under my command, to protect the boats during his absence with the main body; and I was particularly ordered to permit no man of my guard, upon any consideration, to commit depredations upon the inhabitants or their property, which order was obeyed.

B.

GENTLEMEN OF THE COURT: Before you proceed to investigate the subject submitted to you, allow me to make a few remarks on the character of the precept which authorizes your forming yourselves into a court, and the nature of the duties which it imposes on you.

As regards the first charge against me, submitted to your investigation, I have nothing at present to say; the Secretary of the Navy having preferred it against me, he has a perfect right to couch it in whatever language may appear to him most proper to obtain the end he has in view. The mere statement of the charge, however forcible the terms, is no proof of my guilt; and it remains for me to oppose to it the proofs I have in my possession; sufficient, I trust, to show that my conduct in landing in a hostile manner on the shores of Porto Rico was not only justifiable, but praiseworthy.

It is, however, a duty I especially owe to myself and to others under my command, to notice the manner in which the second subject is submitted to your investigation, to wit, the carrying of specie, &c. You will perceive that it is admitted in the precept, that the investigation of this subject is ordered at my particular request, and this being the case, it would seem but just that the request should be complied with, according to its terms.

My request, as contained in my letter to the Secretary of the Navy of the second of March, is in the following words:

"Having this day seen in a print, several letters from Mr. Thomas Randall and Mr. John Mountain, communicated through the State Department to Congress, and highly injurious to the character of myself and other officers belonging to the West India squadron, I have to request that an inquiry may be instituted, to ascertain how far facts will justify their statements and remarks, and the injurious remarks they have elicited on the floor of Congress."

You will perceive, by a perusal of the precept, that your attention is not directed to the inquiry asked for by me. You find nothing said of the particular documents referred to, or the persons named in my application; you are not directed to inquire how far facts will justify their statements and remarks, and the injurious remarks they have elicited on the floor of Congress. You are, in fact, not directed to extend the inquiry, so as to ascertain how far others, as well as myself, were implicated in transactions, which, if true, were highly disreputable to all concerned; but you are simply required to ascertain whether the naval force in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico was employed to the best advantage; whether it was not employed in the transportation of specie, and in other objects of inferior moment, to the neglect of the public interest. I beg you to compare the charge as it stands in the precept, with my request, and say if you can find the slightest resemblance between them. I am not very particular as to the manner in which this charge has been worded; but, as some of the vessels under my command have been "employed in the transportation of specie, and (perhaps) in other objects of inferior moment," all of which, I trust, my orders from the Secretary of the Navy made necessary, your decision, in the negative or affirmative, can therefore have no bearing on the innocence or guilt of myself, and those under my command. The question, had it been submitted to you as was intended by me, would have been simply this: Have Captain Porter and the officers of the West India squadron basely neglected their duty, and sacrificed the public interests, as charged by Messrs. Randall and Mountain; and do they deserve the strictures which have been passed on them on the floor of Congress?

The question, as it now stands in the precept, may require you to investigate the propriety of the orders issued from the Navy Department, but its decision can have no bearing on the conduct of those who acted in obedience to them. My motive in asking for this inquiry, was for the sole purpose of justifying myself, and others under my command, against the charges of Messrs. Randall and Mountain, and the illiberal remarks they gave rise to. I had no wish to pry into the conduct or motives of the Secretary of the Navy, or to implicate him by any investigation touching his official conduct. I have never doubted the propriety of the orders he gave me; nor do I doubt it now—but, as the question submitted to you stands, the result must necessarily be a decision as to their propriety; a decision I have never asked for, and with which I have nothing to do. To me it matters little, whether the orders I acted under were in conformity with the laws for the suppression of piracy or not; it is only necessary for my justification to show, that I acted in strict obedience to the orders I received; let those who issued them, if there is anything wrong in them, answer for the rest.

Messrs. Randall and Mountain are understood to have said, that myself, and others under my command, have neglected the duties which were confided to us, to the discredit of the navy and the nation, to the injury of the property, and to the sacrifice of the citizens of the United States, for the sole purpose of benefiting ourselves, by the transportation of specie. If what those gentlemen say of us is true, we are not only unworthy of holding commissions in the navy, but are deserving the severest punishment a court-martial can sentence us to receive; and if we are not guilty, we should not only be pronounced innocent, but our slanderers and calumniators should be exposed to the world as men unworthy of confidence.

It becomes then a question of character between them and us. If they prove their charges, they deserve well of their country for exposing us, and we must sink, and deservedly; if we acquit ourselves of them, they will no longer be worthy of consideration.

The question then should have been submitted to you in all its bearings, in strict conformity with the language of the request which produced the order for the inquiry; and had this been done, you would have been able to have come to a satisfactory conclusion; but confining yourself to the subject as presented to you in the precept before you, there can be no decision touching the point at issue, between Messrs. Randall and Mountain, and myself and others.

I have taken the liberty to make these remarks at this early period, with the hope that you would, by applying to the Secretary of the Navy, obtain a revision or modification of the precept, so as to enable you to reach the object which induced me to ask the inquiry; or, at least, that such measures might be taken, as may seem to you expedient, to enable you to effect the purpose which caused me to make the application for an investigation of the truth of the charges.

I beg the court to be persuaded that these remarks, and this request, originated in no wish to embarrass, or throw difficulties in the way of the inquiry; but from a sincere desire that the accusers may have every opportunity of proving their charges, and the accused the advantage of rebutting them; that truth may be made known, and justice obtained, the only end and object, it is presumed, of the investigation. I beg leave to state further, that it was not my intention to make, under any circumstances whatever, objections to any member whom the Secretary of the Navy might think proper to order on this court, and I should now waive all objections was my conduct alone the subject of inquiry; but since the Secretary has chosen, by the same precept, to submit to you charges against me, originating with myself, and the investigation of the conduct of myself and others, asked for by me, it is a duty I owe to others, to guard by every means in my power against a decision injurious to them.

It has not escaped your observation, there are two members of this court junior to me. This, however, at first sight, may not by many be considered a reasonable ground of objection, as the act for the better government of the navy only requires three commissioned officers, and a judge advocate, to constitute a court of inquiry; but I think it must be apparent, that the intention of the framers of the law was, that with the exception of the difference of the members which compose them, courts of inquiry should be formed, regulated and governed on the same principles as courts-martial.

A court-martial may consist of from five to thirteen members; but it is required that not more than one-half of the members, if it can be avoided, shall be junior to the officer tried. This rule, no doubt, was intended to prevent the interested feeling of the junior members from operating to the prejudice of the officer to be tried, and the same rule should in justice govern courts of inquiry; courts of inquiry having the same power to summon witnesses, administer oaths and punish contempt, it was evidently designed that they should be similarly constituted. By every rule and principle of justice, the accused should be tried by disinterested juniors, or at least a majority of them.

Will it be contended that, because the law requires three commissioned officers to constitute a court of inquiry, that three commissioned officers, from any of the subordinate classes, would be a sufficient court to investigate and report on the conduct of the commander of a squadron? Lieutenants, pursers, chaplains, surgeons, and I believe surgeons' mates, are commissioned officers; but surely it will not be asserted that a sufficient court for the investigation of my conduct could be formed of these classes. It was, therefore, evidently designed, that only such commissioned officers as may legally sit on a court-martial can sit on a court of inquiry,—should not only be similar in their organization, but also formed of the same materials as courts-martial.

With this view of the subject, I feel that I should do not my duty to others, considering the fearful odds I have to contend against, if I did not submit to the court whether, with a majority junior to myself, it can legally proceed to investigate my conduct. That the court is formed agreeably to the letter of the law, I cannot deny, nor could I, were it formed of any of the subordinate classes I have mentioned. But whether it is formed according to its spirit and intention, and on principles of justice, is the question I beg leave to submit to you.

C.

NAVY YARD, Washington, May 2, 1825.

SIR: I am instructed by the court of inquiry, convened to investigate the conduct of Captain David Porter, to inform you that the court was this day duly organized, in pursuance of the precept in the case, and that after the members were duly sworn, Captain Porter read to the court a certain paper herewith transmitted for your consideration. You will perceive that an exception is taken to the court itself, as not composed of competent members.

This objection applies to a majority of the court, and they consequently feel a delicacy in determining a question involving their own competency. The court, therefore, has deemed it correct, to submit the questions thus raised, to your determination; and to adjourn the court for the purpose of obtaining your opinion, before proceeding in the investigation.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

RICHARD S. COXE, Judge Advocate.

The Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy.

D.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 3, 1825.

SIR: Your letter of yesterday's date, communicating the paper submitted to the court by Captain D. Porter, has been received.

If it was the intention of Captain Porter to present a challenge, or offer a specific legal exception, to any member, the proper tribunal for its decision was the court itself—the proper time was before the members were sworn.

If, as is presumed, he designed to complain of the manner in which the court was composed, as unjust or illegal, he ought, before the meeting of the court, to have applied to the Department, which alone possessed the power of affording a remedy.

A copy of the precept, stating the names of the officers who were to compose the court, and the object of inquiry, was furnished to him on the 20th day of April last.

As, however, you have deemed it correct to "submit the questions raised" by Captain Porter, to "my determination," it is proper to add, that the opinion of the Department as to the legality of constituting the court with three captains, of the same rank with Captain Porter, one being senior, and two junior, to himself, was necessarily expressed in the very act which created and convened the court; and no argument is discovered, in the paper submitted, calculated to change that opinion.

As it is not supposed that the court possesses the power to decide on the form of the precept, the objects for which it should have been convened, or those into which it would be proper to inquire, the reason and design of the comment which is made on the form and words of the precept are not distinctly perceived, and may be totally misapprehended.

If its form seemed incorrect to Captain Porter, or not calculated to meet the objects which he had in asking for an inquiry, the Department, which alone possessed the power to alter the form of the precept, and change the scope of the investigation, ought to have been addressed on the subject.

The President of the United States having thought proper to order an investigation into the transactions at Foxardo, it was the duty of the Department so to frame the precept as to meet that object; and it is believed that the court will find no difficulty in comprehending what is directed on that point.

The inquiry relating to some other parts of the conduct of Captain Porter, while commanding the squadron in the West Indies, was granted at his request, and was intended to be so general, as to permit him the utmost latitude in proving what had been his conduct on any particular point which he might select; and showing that he was free from all just cause of accusation, by whomsoever made. If the words be not sufficiently broad to permit such an investigation, they would heretofore have been promptly extended, at his request, and no difficulty will now be made should he so request it, in so directing the court as to accomplish his object. The defect on this point, if one exist, is not perceived.

It was not the intention of the Department, at the suggestion or solicitation of Captain Porter, to direct the court to inquire into the conduct of other officers, of whose actions the Department saw no cause to complain; who had not asked for any inquiry; and for whom, it was not perceived that he had any authority to demand it.

Much less was it the intention of the Department, on an inquiry asked by him, to submit to the court the legality or the propriety of the orders given to him; nor is it believed that the precept can bear any such construction.

With this view of the matters contained in the papers submitted, the Department has only to direct, that the court, constituted as it is, proceed to make the inquiry directed by the precept.

I am, respectfully, yours, &c., &c.,

(Signed) SAM'L L. SOUTHARD.

RICHARD S. COXE, Esq.,

Judge Advocate of the Naval Court of Inquiry, at the Navy Yard, Washington.

E.*

GENTLEMEN OF THE COURT: Before proceeding to the examination of any witness in my defence, I must beg leave to enter my protest against the decision of the Secretary of the Navy as regards the legality of the formation of the court. A question of law and justice, on which the court either from incompetency or delicacy are unwilling to come to a decision, should not be decided on by the officer with whom the illegality and injustice complained of is supposed to have originated. A question of the importance of the one submitted to you, I was impressed with a belief, at the time of presenting it, would be, and am still of the opinion should be, submitted to the Attorney General of the United States, if the court from any cause, was unwilling to take the responsibility on itself. And, in order that I may not be supposed to have given my assent to any circumstance, which by any tribunal hereafter, may be supposed to vitiate the legality of your proceedings, I must beg leave to decline taking any part whatever in this investigation, until the question I have submitted to you is decided on by competent authority—a question not originating in any captious disposition on my part to create difficulties, as it would appear, from the quotation in the Secretary's letter, is supposed to be the cause, but from a sincere desire that every proceeding in the case should be conducted according to the strictest principles of law and justice.

If an error, as is intimated, was committed in point of form, in the time taken to state my objection, the court will no doubt recollect that the error did not originate with me. I apprised the members assembled before its formation of my intention, and adopted the time suggested to me by the judge advocate. But even if an error had been committed by me merely in point of form, is it just, considering all circumstances, that the party opposed to me should avail itself of this error to my disadvantage, when no intimation whatever of the error was made to me, at any time, either by the court, or its law adviser?

That I did not apply to the Department before the meeting of the court, to remedy the evil complained of, scarcely needs an explanation; if it does, you have it now in the decision of the Secretary.

I feel it due to myself, in making this protest, to place on the record my reply to the intimation, that the precept would have been changed, on my application, before the meeting of the court.

You have already been made acquainted with the language used in my application for the investigation sought for by me; it is therefore unnecessary to repeat it. The Secretary, in what purports to be his reply, dated on 16th of March, states as follows:

"It has become my duty to apprise you of the determination of the Executive, that a court of inquiry will be formed, as soon as circumstances will permit, to examine into the occurrence at Foxardo, which was the occasion of your recall, and also to comply with the request contained in your letter of the 8th inst."

I must observe that I understood the Secretary to mean by the letter of the 8th my letter of the 2d, as I never made any request to him in any letter of that date, relating to the subjects submitted to you. Confiding in the assurance of his reply, I was greatly surprised at the wording of the precept, and I must leave you to decide whether, after it had been issued, the court was not the proper medium through which I was bound to communicate with the Secretary.

I will further remark that, in the letter accompanying the precept, the Secretary, from some objections to the style of my letter, thought proper to remind me of the relation which subsists between me and the Department. And not willing that offence should in future be taken when none was intended, or to incur a similar reproof when none was deserved, I thought it safest, on my own account, that all my communications should, in future, be made to you, and through you.

E.†

GENTLEMEN OF THE COURT: Before proceeding to the examination of any witness in my defence, I must beg leave to enter my protest against the decision of the Secretary of the Navy, as regards the legality of the formation of the court.

---

*As with the objectionable matter underscored by the court. †As presented by Captain Porter.

A question of law and justice on which the court, either from incompetency or delicacy, are unwilling to come to a decision, should not be decided on by the officer with whom the illegality and justice complained of is supposed to have originated. A question of the importance of the one submitted to you, I was impressed with a belief, at the time of presenting it, would be, and am still of the opinion should be, submitted to the Attorney General of the United States, if the court from any cause was unwilling to take the responsibility on itself. And, in order that I may not be supposed to have given my assent to any circumstance which, by any tribunal hereafter, may be supposed to vitiate the legality of your proceedings, I must beg leave to decline taking any part whatever in this investigation, until the question I have submitted to you is decided on by competent authority—a question not originating in any captious disposition on my part to create difficulties, as it would appear, from the quotation in the secretary's letter, is supposed to be the case, but from a sincere desire that every proceeding in the case should be conducted according to the strictest principles of law and justice.

If an error, as is intimated, was committed in point of form, in the time taken to state my objection, the court will no doubt recollect that the error did not originate with me. I apprised the members assembled before its formation of my intention, and adopted the time suggested to me by the judge advocate. But even if an error had been committed by me, merely in point of form, is it just, considering all circumstances, that the party opposed to me should avail itself of this error to my disadvantage, when no intimation whatever of the error was made to me, at any time, either by the court or its law adviser?

That I did not apply to the Department before the meeting of the court, to remedy the evil complained of, scarcely needs an explanation; if it does, you have it now in the decision of the Secretary.

I feel it due to myself, in making this protest, to place on the record my reply to the intimation, that the precept would have been changed, on my application, before the meeting of the court.

You have already been made acquainted with the language used in my application for the investigation sought for by me; it is therefore unnecessary to repeat it. The Secretary, in what purports to be his reply, dated on the 16th of March, states as follows:

"It has become my duty to apprise you of the determination of the Executive, that a court of inquiry will be formed, as soon as circumstances will permit, to examine into the occurrence at Foxardo, which was the occasion of your recall, and also to comply with the request contained in your letter of the 8th instant."

I must observe that I understood the Secretary to mean by the letter of the 8th, my letter of the 2d, as I never made any request of him in any letter of that date relating to the subjects submitted to you. Confiding in the assurance of his reply, I was greatly surprised at the wording of the precept, and I must leave you to decide whether, after it had been issued, the court was not the proper medium through which I was bound to communicate with the Secretary.

I will further remark that, in the letter accompanying the precept, the Secretary, from some objections to the style of my letter, thought proper to remind me of the relation which subsists between me and the Department; and not willing that offence should in future be taken when none was intended, or to incur a similar reproof when none was deserved, I thought it safest, on my own account, that all my communications should in future be made to you, and through you.

F.

WASHINGTON, May 5, 1825.

GENTLEMEN OF THE COURT: Having carefully perused the paper commented on by the court, on account of which it is thought proper to pass censure, and not being able to detect in it a single expression which bears the construction the court has thought proper to place on it, I cannot consent, by any alteration on my part, to admit that by it any disrespect was intended by me, either to the court or the head of the Navy Department; and it is the cause of great surprise to me that the court should have entertained such an opinion.

The court having thought proper to underscore, as disrespectful, the word incompetency, as used by me in relation to it, I beg to state distinctly that the word was not used in regard to intellectual incompetency, and in no other sense could it be offensive; but with respect to its legal incompetency, (in the opposite sense in which the court itself applied the word competency,) which was supposed to be admitted when the subject was referred to the Secretary for his decision. Delicacy I did not conceive to be the only motive for the course taken by the court, as I did not believe it a sufficient and satisfactory one; being under the impression that it was the duty of every officer to perform the service confided to him, however delicate, provided it be legal.

The declining to make a decision on my first application, and referring the subject to the Secretary of the Navy, was, as I supposed, an admission of the incompetency of the court to decide, or a voluntary relinquishment of its right, if it possessed it; a right which, I am of opinion, the court cannot again resume after the opinion of the Secretary is, at its request, made known.

If the court had the right to decide in the first instance, no delicacy should have prevented its decision; but relinquishing its right, I am under the impression it cannot resume it to decide now as to its legality, and I cannot acquiesce either in its power to decide, the propriety of the decision it has come to, or the rule it has established with regard to the course it has thought proper to adopt towards me.

If I am not permitted to appear before the court on terms of perfect equality with my accusers, whoever they be, and to defend myself in the way which may appear to me the most proper, (always observing due respect to the court and the Secretary,) I must, in justice to myself, decline offering any defence, which may be liable to be weakened by an interposition on the part of this or any other tribunal.

With this remark I beg leave to adhere to the determination expressed in the paper on which the court has animadverted with so much, and I think with such undeserved, severity.

I have the honor to return to the court a copy of the paper commented on, underscored, and marked by it as objectionable, together with a copy as it was submitted by me to the court.

I have the honor to be, with sentiments of the highest respect, the court's very obedient servant,

D. PORTER.

The President and Members of the Court of Inquiry, now in session.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 7, 1825.

SIR: I received, yesterday, from Captain David Porter, a letter transmitting a number of papers which he designates as "original letters and depositions, respecting transactions at Foxardo, and the piratical character of the place." His letter is dated, no doubt by mistake, "March 6, 1825."

It is supposed to be the wish of Captain Porter, that these papers should be laid before the court of inquiry for its consideration. They are therefore, with a copy of his letter, enclosed to you for that purpose.

I also enclose, for the same purpose, certain papers in the Spanish language, received through the Department of State from Mr. Salmon, Charge des Affaires of the government of Spain, in this country. They are accompanied by translations.

I am, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,
(Signed) SAM'L L. SOUTHARD.

RICHARD S. COXE, Esq., Judge Advocate, present.

H.

NAVY YARD, Washington, May 9, 1825.

SIR: I am instructed by the court to transmit to you, agreeably to the directions of the precept, the report of the result of the investigation which has been made into the conduct of Captain David Porter, in landing with an armed force on the Island of Porto Rico, in November last.

Having no evidence to lay before the court, in regard to the second branch of the investigation directed to be made, and Captain Porter having declined taking any part in the investigation, and entered his protest against the competency of the court, I am also instructed to inform you that it has nothing before it at this time, and has adjourned until to-morrow morning, at 11 o'clock.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) RICH'D S. COXE, Judge Advocate.

The Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy.

I certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the record of the proceedings in the foregoing case on file in this department.

CHAS. HAY, Chief Clerk.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, July 6, 1825.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE COURT OF INQUIRY, IN RELATION TO THE TRANSPORTATION OF SPECIE.

TUESDAY, May 10.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court, and the judge advocate. No answer having been received to the communication made yesterday to the Secretary of the Navy, the court adjourned till to-morrow morning, at 11 o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, May 11.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court, the judge advocate, and Captain Porter. The judge advocate submitted to the court a communication from the honorable the Secretary of the Navy, which was read, annexed to the record, and marked I, and sundry documents accompanying it. The reading of the documents was continued until half after three o'clock, when the court adjourned till 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

THURSDAY, May 12.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court, the judge advocate, and Captain Porter. The court proceeded in the reading of the documents, and continued reading the same until three o'clock, when the court adjourned till to-morrow morning at half-past 10 o'clock.

FRIDAY, May 13.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: as before. The judge advocate read and submitted to the court sundry orders from Captain Porter, during his command, annexed to the record.

The court proceeded to the examination of Thomas Randall, Esq., who, being duly sworn, according to law, deposes and says:

Question. In what public capacity did you visit the Island of Cuba, in the year 1824? when did you arrive there? and how long did you remain?

Answer. The official duties enjoined upon me, on going to the Island of Cuba, were various. The principal related to reclamations, to be made on the authorities of the island, arising out of captures made by privateers from Porto Rico and Porto Cabello; appeals in which cases had been carried up to courts in the Island of Cuba. I was also charged with demanding certain papers and documents from the authorities of the island, to be used before the commissioners under the Florida treaty. I held also the appointment of commissary (a separate one) for demanding the archives and accounts under the Florida treaty. I was also charged with certain confidential duties, which it is unnecessary to mention, as they have no relation to the present subject of inquiry.

The instruction contained in the printed document contains all that I received from the government on the subject of piracy, and was considered wholly incidental, not forming one of the objects of my visit. I arrived at Havana on the 3d May, 1824, and sailed from the island on or about the 9th of November, to the best of my recollection. I was upon the island during the whole of that period, with the exception of about a week, consumed in a voyage to Matanzas, via Key West, in the schooner Terrier.

Ques. Do the printed documents shown you contain your dispatches to the government?

Ans. Yes; there may be some verbal inaccuracies, but, with that exception, they contain all I wrote upon the subject of piracy to any one.

Ques. At the time you were in the Island of Cuba, were you acquainted with the instructions under which Commodore Porter was acting?

Ans. No.

Ques. From what source did you obtain the information you communicated? were they official or private?

Ans. The sources were various: sometimes from casual conversations; sometimes from one gentleman; sometimes from another. My object was to obtain such information as I could rely upon, from whatever quarter it could be had. I endeavored to exercise a discriminating judgment as to the credit which was to be given to the sources from which the information was obtained; and I believe that I have usually stated to the government the amount of credit to which the different facts which I communicated, were, in my opinion, entitled. The information was spontaneously communicated to me, conceiving it to be a subordinate part of my business; and being very much occupied, and sometimes sick, I did not search for information upon this head. I did not conceive it to be my duty to search for information regarding the navy; but I conceived it my duty, when facts came to my knowledge, to report them.

Ques. During the period of your stay in Cuba, in what description of vessels did the pirates usually go to sea?

Ans. Generally, I believe, in open boats; sometimes in boats, I believe partially decked—calculated either to row or sail, or both; sometimes in schooners of a larger class.

Ques. Were these vessels calculated for a small draft of water, and were the places from which they could put out and take refuge, numerous, and difficult to find along the coast of Cuba?

Ans. Such was the information communicated to me, from sources which I deemed authentic.

Ques. Could any naval force, however numerous or vigilant, ensure safety at all times from these pirates, without the active aid of the authorities on shore?

Ans. I have given a deliberate opinion upon that subject, in my communication to the government, which remains unchanged, but rather confirmed by information subsequently received.

Ques. During the spring and summer of 1824, how many vessels were under the command of Commodore Porter? where were they employed, and in what service respectively?

Ans. I cannot say; I know nothing of the vessels, except from their occasional visits to Cuba, while I was there, and causual conversations of the officers attached to them. I knew no other way of their being under the command of Commodore Porter after his return to the United States.

Ques. During your stay in Cuba, what American men-of-war, according to your recollection, touched at the island?

Ans. While I was at Havana, the John Adams arrived on the 4th May, reported to be last from Matanzas, and sailed about the 6th for the Bay of Mexico. The schooner Wild Cat arrived from Matanzas on the 24th May bound to Key West. The steam galliot, with Commodore Porter, arrived on the 12th May, from Matanzas, and sailed, I believe, for the same place, on the same evening. May 31st, the Terrier arrived from the same place. On the 16th June, the Spark, reported from Tampico and Alvarado, and sailed on the 22d for New York. July 7th, the Grampus arrived off the Moro, reported from the Bay of Mexico, and sailed on or about the 8th, for New York. July 10th, the Terrier arrived from a cruise after pirates, and sailed the same day. July 12th, the John Adams arrived from the Bay of Mexico, and sailed the 18th, for Philadelphia. On the 20th, one of the small schooners arrived; I did not ascertain which. On the 29th, the Terrier was in the port—August 3d, she was in port: whether she had been out in the interim, I cannot say. On the 4th, I sailed in her for Matanzas, via Key West, for benefit of my health. I think I returned about the 30th August to Havana, in the steamboat. The Fox arrived September 15th, reported from Tampico, and sailed on the 19th, I believe, for the United States. On the 17th September, the Weazel arrived from the United States, via Barbadoes, bound to Tampico, as reported. The 23d, the Ferret, from Key West, for medical aid. October 13th, the Porpoise arrived from the coast of Africa. On the 16th, the Hornet arrived, last from St. Jago. The Shark arrived, I think, about the 4th November, reported from the Bay of Mexico; I think from Alvarado and Tampico. She had also previously arrived from the United States, on her way to the Bay of Mexico, date not recollected. There may have been other arrivals and departures without my knowledge; but I have a memorandum from my journal of those which I have stated.

Ques. How many, and which, of these vessels carried specie? what amount? where from? and where bound, as you understood at the time?

Ans. I am uninformed in most of the cases of any particulars as to the amount of specie. I learned generally that most of the vessels arriving at Havana from the ports in the Bay of Mexico, had specie on board on freight. Captain Gallagher, of the Shark, reported to me that he had $127,000 to be delivered at Havana and in the United States. My impression is that Captain Dallas informed me he had some specie, the amount I do not recollect. Lieutenant Ritchie gave me the same information, I think, in regard to his vessel. I heard, also, that the Spark carried specie.

Ques. If there is any information which you possess, other than that you have communicated, calculated to elucidate the subject before the court, will you be good enough to state it?

Ans. I do not at present recollect anything in particular. It may, perhaps, be proper to mention, as my impression, that some of the information I obtained relative to the transaction of specie, was derived from Mr. Mountain, the vice consul, and acting in the room of Mr. Warner, the consul, in whose office the negotiations, relative to the transportation of specie, were sometimes transacted in my presence.

Ques. Do you know of any shipments of specie being made by any of the vessels from Havana?

Ans. I do not recollect any particular instance, except that I am under the impression that Captain Gallagher informed me he had received on board the Shark some additional specie at that place. I have also a general impression that when vessels were about sailing from Havana to the United States, additional sums were put on board them there. I returned to the United States in the Shark.

William B. Finch, a master commandant in the navy of the United States, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

Between November, 1823, and the autumn of 1824, I acted as captain to the squadron under the command of Commodore Porter. The orders in the order book, in my handwriting, were the general orders which were circulated through the squadron. I considered the squadron employed, during the whole period that I was with it, in conformity with the instructions received from the Department. The suppression of piracy and the protection of commerce appeared to be the particular objects in view. Some vessels were occasionally dispatched for the special purpose of suppressing the slave trade. The vessels which went down the gulf, and carried specie, as well as my recollection serves me, were the John Adams, Captain Dallas; the Grampus, Lieutenant Commandant Sloat; the Weazel, Lieutenant Commandant Boarman; the Jackall, Lieutenant Commandant Lee; the Fox, Lieutenant Commandant Ritchie; the Weazel, Lieutenant Commandant Zantzinger. All had orders, as I believe, to receive specie, in subordination to the general duties of the squadron. This was part of the routine in the service. The Shark, Lieutenant Stevens, went from the United States direct to that quarter, with agents from the Bank of the United States. This was, I believe, the only instance in which the carrying specie was the special object. According to my opinion all the force was employed which the circumstances of the case required for the suppression of piracy. When we left Matanzas, about the middle of June, for the United States, I do not think there was any appearance of piracy remaining in that quarter, and a sufficient force was left there to keep it down. Two small schooners, the Ferret and the Terrier, were left under the command of Lieutenants Farragut and Paine, with a barge, to look after pirates, and to keep open the communication between Thompson's Island and Cuba. In the then state of things, I thought that force as competent to effect the object as a larger one could have been. I think such was the disposition and feeling of the officers, that if any course had suggested itself as calculated to effect the suppression of piracy, it would have been mentioned to Commodore Porter; but none better calculated to attain that end, was, as I believe, thought of. I believe that it was the universal opinion of the officers, that the force under the command of Commodore Porter could not have been more efficaciously employed.

When I returned to the United States, the Sea Gull alone came; the two vessels mentioned were left there, and other vessels of the squadron would be occasionally arriving at Thompson's Island from different quarters, where they had been cruising.

The court adjourned till half-past ten o'clock, to-morrow morning.

SATURDAY, May 4.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: as before.

A. J. Dallas, a master commandant in the navy of the United States, being sworn according to law, says:

Question. In what capacity did you serve in the squadron under the command of Commodore Porter, and during what period of time?

Answer I was master commandant, in command of the John Adams, from some time in November, 1823, till the month of February, 1825, when we arrived in the United States.

Ques. On what service were you employed during that period? Produce such orders and instructions as you received.

Ans. From February, 1824, when we left the United States, until May 2d, 1824, when Commodore Porter, with his family, left the John Adams, that vessel bearing his broad pendant, had been engaged in cruising in the West Indies, say from St. Barts to Key West, running down through the islands. The particular object of this cruise was the destruction of all the pirates, and piratical establishments, as well on the ocean as on shore, that we could meet with. The letter from Captain Porter, of April 8th, 1824, contains a correct history of the cruise till its date. In that letter, Commodore Porter, speaks of a small schooner which had taken shelter among the Colorados reefs; this being the only vessel of a suspicious character which we saw during the period of time that he was with me. I will state the circumstances which occurred in relation to her.

On making the schooner, the commodore at once pronounced her to be of a piratical character, and directed me to haul into the reef and to prepare two quarter boats; his anxiety then induced him to ascend the mizen rigging; on seeing her get under way, we ran the ship into three fathoms water on the reef. Finding it dangerous to go further, the boats were lowered down and sent in pursuit.

They were absent some short time, but finding the schooner was getteng away from them they were recalled. On their return to the ship, we made sail in company with the convoy, as many as ten or twelve vessels, and proceeded to Thompson's Island. Immediately on our arrival at the island, an expedition was fitted out under the command of Captain Wilkinson, composed of the Sea Gull and three barges, two of which were manned and officered from the John Adams. They were directed to proceed, as I understood, in search of the vessel we had seen at the Colorados reef. After some considerable absence, they returned without having been able to detect the vessel, but with information from the shore of her piratical character. Captain Wilkinson's report of the expedition is dated April 24, 1824. Shortly after their return, I was directed to get under way and proceed to Matanzas. The commodore and his family still on board. Off Matanzas, on the 2d May, I received the order of that date, (read and annexed.) Lieutenant Lee, in company with Lieutenant Legare, in the Jackall and Wild Cat, in consequence of the failure of the expedition sent after the schooner, and the information communicated by Captain Wilkinson of which I have spoken, were dispatched by the commodore to Cape Cartouche where the said schooner was supposed to have sailed to fit out. After performing the duties assigned to them, Lieutenant Lee, in the Jackall, was to join me at any point in the Gulf of Mexico which I might direct. I think I directed him to meet me at Alvarado. As relates to the cruise directed in my orders of May 2d, these orders were fully performed, with the exception of touching at Campeachy; my reasons for not going there, were, that I ascertained that my vessel would be obliged to anchor about 25 miles from the land, and the Jackall was about going there, which I considered as superseding the necessity of my visiting that place. I therefore crossed the bank of Yucatan, and went down to Tampico, going as near to Cape Cartouche as I could.

I remained a very short time at Tampico, about three days, when I sailed for Vera Cruz. I arrived at about 9 o'clock off the Castle of St. Juan de Ulloa, and hove to for the night. In the morning finding that a strong current had carried me considerably to the eastward, I concluded to stop off Alvarado, where I remained some few days. At each of these places that I visited, I offered convoy to American vessels, but there were none at the time who required it

I left Alvarado in a few days, and proceeded to the Island of Sacrificios, near Vera Cruz. Finding nothing to detain me there, after remaining about thirty-six hours, I returned to Tampico. On my route to Alvarado, I fell in with Lieutenant Lee, whom I left at that place.

On my last visit to Tampico, I remained eight or ten days, and received on board from Mr. Robinson, then partner of the American consul, and since holding himself that office, $104,000 in specie; of this about $70,000 was destined to Philadelphia, and the residue to be delivered at Havana. After receiving that money on board, and not considering my cruise as having expired, I sailed for Vera Cruz, when I met with a small English brig of war, from which I received information of some piratical acts that had been committed near a lake called Terminos, on the main near the head of the gulf, where it was said that pirates had retreated after making a capture. On receiving this information, I immediately got under way and proceeded to Alvarado, where I requested of the commandant of marines one of the Mexican gunboats as a loan, not having myself any small vessel, and the draft of the John Adams being too great to permit my approach to the lake. He loaned me the baat, when I officered and manned her. The second night after sailing from Alvarado towards the lake, the gunboat in company, the wind blowing fresh, I was informed by Lieutenant Grimke, who was in command of her, that the mast was sprung. On examination I found myself obliged to return with her to Alvarado, where I delivered her over again to the commandant from whom I had procured her; requesting our consul Mr. Taylor, in case he found that the accident had occurred while the boat was in our possession, to have it replaced.

Having thus lost so much time, and aware of the impossibility of doing anything with the John Adams alone, from her being unable to approach the shore, I concluded that, as the time had expired which had been allowed for my cruise, to return to the Havana; I arrived at Havana July 12th, and sailed, I think, on the 15th, for Matanzas, where I expected to receive orders from Commodore Porter. I got my orders there, directing me to proceed immediately to New York. On receiving these orders, I wrote to him the letter, (read and annexed,) and sailed for Philadelphia, where I arrived about the 26th of the same month. After refitting at Philadelphia, and the ship being reported ready for sea, an order was received from Commodore Barron, directing me not to proceed to sea until further orders. An order, dated October 22d, from Commodore Porter, was received, directing me to be ready to proceed immediately to sea on his joining the ship.

The day after receiving the order, late in the evening, Commodore Porter arrived at Newcastle; early the next morning he came on board, and we proceeded to sea. We arrived at St. Bartholomews early in November. After remaining there a short time we proceeded to St. Thomas; from thence to Passage Island; and thence to Foxardo, where the circumstance happened, which I have already fully detailed. From thence we coasted the islands down, examining all the places that were suspicious, or which we supposed might shelter pirates of any description—particularly the Island of Cuba, where I do not think that from Cape Maze, on the easternmost end of the Isle of Pines, and the Jardines on the south side at the west end of Cuba, there was a single creek, inlet or bay, of any size or description, which was not carefully examined; the ship being, during the day, from a mile and a half to two miles from the shore, and the boats constantly engaged in the examination. From thence we proceeded to the Dry Tortugas, anchoring among them, and remaining there two or three days. Thence we proceeded to Thompson's Island. After being some time at Key West, we received a report that some piracies had been committed. An expedition was fitted out, consisting of two barges, manned and officered from the John Adams, and under the command of Lieutenant Grimke. These boats left Thompson's Island and joined the Sea Gull, on board of which was the commodore, at Havana. On board the Sea Gull was also a part of the marine guard of the John Adams. Previous to the return of the boats, Commodore Porter had received orders from the Navy Department to return to the United States. He selected the John Adams to return in. We were detained until some time in February, in consequence of the absence of the men and officers of the John Adams on the above expedition. We sailed in February, and towards the end of that month, arrived in Hampton Roads. One of the boats, officered and manned from the John Adams, did not rejoin us, previous to our sailing for the United States.

Ques. During your being in the John Adams, under the command of Commodore Porter, did you carry on freight any other specie than what you have already mentioned?

Ans. None.

Ques. Was that specie shipped entirely by American merchants?

Ans. It was shipped by Mr. Robertson, an American, and now American consul at Tampico.

Ques. What premium or freight was received on account of such transportation, and how was it appropriated?

Ans. I believe there was $1,899.99 received for the freight, the third of which was paid to Commodore Porter—the residue was my own. The portion paid to the commodore was paid pursuant to the general custom—not asked or exacted by him.

Ques. Was any time consumed at the place where this specie was received—on the passage, or at the port of delivery—in consequence of your vessel being engaged in transporting specie, which would otherwise have been devoted to the suppression of piracy?—or was the vessel in any respect diverted from the course which she would have pursued, had she not carried specie?

Ans. No; the only variation was, that the John Adams went into the port of Philadelphia, instead of New York.

Ques. Did you at any time, when, and under what circumstances, deviate from the course you would otherwise have pursued, for the purpose of taking on board, or carrying specie?

Ans. In no case. On the contrary, it was mentioned to me, that if I would wait at Tampico, or would return there, a much larger sum of money would be ready for me to carry. I have no doubt that, had I remained there, I should have carried a great deal of specie. A large convoy was expected down, and anxiety was expressed that I should remain to take the money.

Ques. Independently of the carrying of specie, did the general protection of the commerce of American citizens, and the suppression of piracies, require the presence of the vessels of the squadron in the Gulf of Mexico, as frequently as they were sent there? and at the places to which they were sent?

Ans. I have no doubt that it was so: numerous instances occurred, such as the capture and detention of American vessels and property, requiring the interposition of public vessels. About the time of my first arrival at Alvarado, the Spark gave convoy to a number of vessels, having on board specie, to the amount of more than half a million of dollars.

Ques. Were the vessels of the squadron serving under Captain Porter in the habit of giving convoy to merchant vessels belonging to the United States?

Ans. Their instructions were to offer convoy on all occasions, and it was always done when required, without leaving at too great a distance the ground where the vessels were directed to cruise.

Ques. Was everything done by the squadron under Captain Porter's orders that could be done, to the best of your knowledge and belief, to suppress piracy?

Ans. So far as my knowledge extends, everything was done that could be done: no report of piracy being committed anywhere reached us, but that Commodore Porter endeavored to dispatch a competent force to the place.

Ques. Is there any other matter relating to this inquiry, of which you possess any knowledge? If so, state it fully to the court.

Ans. I do not recollect anything further that is material.

Captain William B. Finch, again:

Question. Did you derive any advantage from the transportation of specie, by any part of the squadron under the command of Captain Porter?

Answer. I did not.

Ques. Could you be personally benefited by such transportation in the situation which you held?

Ans. I presume not: the money received for such transportation, being divided between the captain of the vessel by which it was carried and the commodore of the squadron, I had no concern in it of any kind.

Ques. Is there any other matter relating to this inquiry, of which you possess any knowledge? If so, state it fully to the court.

Ans. I know of nothing further that is material, unless it may be the letters here presented from me to him, (read and annexed.)

Stephen Cassin, a captain in the navy of the United States, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

Question. In what capacity did you serve in the squadron under the command of Captain Porter, and between what periods?

Answer. I was a master commandant, commanding the Peacock from January, 1823, with Commodore Porter on board, carrying his broad pendant, and continued so for some months. After he left the Peacock, and shifted his broad pendant to the Sea Gull, I continued in command of the Peacock till, I think, December, 1823.

Ques. On what particular service were you employed during that period? Produce such orders and instructions as you received, relating in any manner to the subject of this investigation.

Ans. I went originally to sea in company with the Shark, the eight small schooners, the Grayhound, Beagle, Terrier, Wild Cat, Ferret, Weasel, Fox, Jackall, attached to the squadron, the Decoy, store ship, and the steam galliot the Sea Gull. We proceeded to St. Thomas, the place of rendezvous—we remained there a day or two. The commodore dispatched two or three of the schooners to proceed down the south side of Porto Rico, to examine the creeks and inlets on that coast. The remainder of the squadron went down the north side of the island, and communicated with the shore of the Island of Porto Rico. Thence we proceeded to Aguadilla, anchored and took in water. The Peacock then proceeded down the old Bahama Straits, in company with some of the small schooners engaged in the search after pirates and the examination of the coast. After making the south side of Cuba, we hauled over to Key Verd, where it was supposed some pirates were lurking; but finding none, returned over to the Cuba coast, proceeded down the old straits, occasionally coming to an anchor at night, keeping near the shore in the day time, engaged in the examination of the coast, and continued down till we arrived at Sugar Key, where we anchored near the shore. We here found two British men-of-war also engaged in the same object, with whom we communicated. By the orders of the commodore, we got our boats out, manned with eighty men, and, commanded by three lieutenants, proceeded down in company with two schooners inside of the reef, examining the nooks and corners for pirates, and after this proceeded to Matanzas and joined the ship. The vessel was engaged during the same time in examining and coming to an anchor at night. At Matanzas we watered. In the meantime boats were sent out on an expedition to Hidden Harbor, where it was supposed there were some pirates, but they returned without finding any. During their cruise the service was extremely arduous, the men much exposed to the sun by day, and heavy dews at night, with few or no comforts; and were much exhausted by the incessant and severe fatigue. We proceeded to Key West in the Peacock—the remainder of the squadron was dispatched in different directions, giving convoy, and searching for pirates in various quarters. We arrived at Thompson's Island about the beginning of April. Immediately after anchoring, we commenced fitting out and preparing barges, and were employed in various other duties. After the barges were fitted, I was directed to proceed with two of them of the largest class, and about eighty or ninety of my men, and two schooners (the Peacock having been laid up) to Havana. Off that place I communicated with the shore, and obtained information of a pirate having been off the Moro a day or two previous, committing depredations upon American and other vessels. It was understood to be a fast sailing schooner, the Pilot, formerly from Norfolk, which had been captured off the coast, and fitted out by the pirates. I made arrangements with Lieutenant Stribling to go in search of him, and in the meantime I remained at anchor off the Moro, for the purpose of affording protection to some vessels which were to sail the next day. Lieutenant Stribling proceeded after the pirate and captured her—as his report will show. The next morning the fleet came out. I got under way, and proceeded convoying them till I fell in with Lieutenant Skinner in the Wild Cat, under whose charge I left them, and proceeded to rejoin my boat, which I fell in with about three o'clock in the afternoon, with the Pilot in company—took the barges in tow; directed Lieutenant Stribling to continue on board the Pilot with a number of men. We returned to Havana, where I sent him in for water. On his return we proceeded in obedience to our orders to Cayo Blanco, and continued our searches in that neighborhood—proceeded down towards Cape Antonio, going about twenty or twenty-five miles a day, with the barges sounding ahead, examining the coast, through an exceedingly intricate navigation. Proceeded to Cape Antonio, and examined every nook and corner inside of the reef and Pirate Bay—famous places of resort for pirates. In running down the distance, I captured a sloop boat and a felucca boat, which had been deserted on reaching the beach—landing occasionally. I saw several wrecks of vessels that had been burned. During the whole period the men suffered extremely, particularly from fatigue, exposure, and want of water, which we found it impossible to procure.

During the time that I was engaged in this expedition, another was out under the immediate command of the commodore, in a different direction, with which it was designed that I should co-operate.

Previous to my going through the Colorados reef, the British had attempted it with two small schooners, but were obliged to abandon the attempt as impracticable. After remaining in that neighborhood I proceeded to Thompson's Island, where I resumed the command of the Peacock, and made the report of the 28th April, which has been read.

The court adjourned till half after ten o'clock, on Monday morning.

MONDAY MORNING, May 16.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of Saturday. Present: as before.

Master commandant William B. Finch, again called:

Question During the time you were with the squadron under Captain Porter, was it generally believed and understood that reports were circulated of piratical acts, which had no foundation in truth, for the purpose of distracting the attention of the squadron, or for any other, and for what purpose?

Answer. I am under the impression that many such reports were circulated that had no foundation in fact: the distracting of the attention of the squadron would be a very probable motive for raising them, but I cannot of course speak positively as to the object designed to be answered. I am also of opinion, that, had we possessed ten times the force we did, it would have been impossible to act upon all these reports, or to answer all the demands that were made.

Ques. How many well authenticated instances of piracy do you recollect to have occurred while you were with the squadron, and what was done in those instances?

Ans. I recollect but one which occurred. It was in the neighborhood of Matanzas. Lieutenant Voorhees was dispatched immediately in pursuit of the piratical vessel in the Sea Gull, and succeeded in capturing her in the course of a few hours.

Ques. Do you know anything of an Englishman who keeps a ferry in the neighborhood of Matanzas, and had you the means of knowing whether that ferry was much used by pirates, or those having intercourse with them?

Ans. I know the man, and was several times at his house: never heard of any such thing. Commodore Porter and his family resided at the place for some two or three weeks. It was in the month of May and June, 1824, that I was there, and that Commodore Porter resided there.

Ques. Had you the superintendence of the granting convoy? State the circumstances under which it was usual to grant it; and what was done.

Ans. That duty devolved on me at Matanzas. The object was to see vessels off which were leaving the port, and those into port, which were coming there. It was usual almost daily for some of the squadron to go out with those which sailed in the morning, when the wind suited, and to return in the evening, with such as were arriving. In some instances convoy was offered, but refused, rather than delay till all the vessels were ready to proceed.

Captain Stephen Cassin—in continuation:

On the 10th May sailed for Havana, in the Peacock, where we arrived on the 11th, and watered. On the 14th sailed for Vera Cruz, in pursuance of the special orders of the date of May 7th, 1823, read and annexed, and arrived on the 21st of the same month. On the 20th June sailed for Tampico, and remained there till July 9th. During these passages I gave chase to and overhauled every suspicious vessel. While in port, I considered that my presence was useful to the American commerce in that vicinity—being the only American armed vessel in that neighborhood, during a considerable part of the time. July 9th, sailed for Thompson's Island, and arrived there on the 22d of the same month. August 4th, sailed for the Havana—arrived there on the 5th, and remained there till the 9th, when I sailed for Thompson's Island, and arrived there on the 10th. From the 10th August, till September 16th, remained at Thompson's Island, during which period the officers and men were daily engaged in operations on shore—many of them taken with the yellow fever, and died daily. Commodore Porter was himself ill with the fever, and it was judged proper to send the Peacock to the United States, in company with the John Adams: arrived at Norfolk October 1st.

Captain Cassin produced some orders which he received, which were read and annexed.

Ques. While under the command of Captain Porter, did you carry any money on freight?

Ans. I did. I took on board at Tampico and Vera Cruz, altogether, about $130,000 or $140,000. The greater part was landed at the Havana; the residue, about $18,000 or $20,000, was sent home from Havana, in some of the small vessels of the squadron.

Ques. Was it shipped by American merchants, or by whom?

Ans. It was shipped by Mr. Robinson and Mr. Taylor, American agents at Tampico and Vera Cruz. I do not know who owned it; these were the persons with whom the business was transacted.

Ques. What premium or freight was received for such transportation in the Peacock, and how was it appropriated?

Ans. It was 1½ or 2 per cent. One-third of the net proceeds was paid the commodore—the rest retained by me.

Ques. Was any time consumed at the place where the specie was shipped—on the passage, or at the port where the Peacock delivered it—in consequence of her being engaged in the transportation of specie, which could otherwise have been specially devoted to the suppression of piracy?

Ans. I was at Vera Cruz during a very unsettled period, and waited there for some time for the purpose of taking specie on board, but I considered the protection afforded to American commerce was as great and as important as if I had been engaged in cruising.

Ques. Independently of the carrying of specie, did the general protection of American commerce and property, and the suppression of piracy, require the presence of the vessels of the squadron in the Gulf of Mexico as frequently as they were sent there, and at the places to which they were sent?

Ans. I think so certainly.

Ques. Were the vessels of the squadron in the practice of affording convoy to American vessels?

Ans. Always.

Ques. Was everything done by the squadron to suppress piracy, which you conceive could have been done to attain that object?

Ans. Everything I conceive was done which could be done.

Ques. Is there any other matter relating to the subject under investigation which you deem material? If so, state it fully to the court.

Ans. There is nothing.

Ques. During the time you were under the command of Captain Porter, had you reason to believe that reports were circulated in the West Indies, of piratical acts which were known to have no foundation in truth?

Ans. I believe such unfounded reports were numerous. I have no doubt many were got up for the purpose of drawing the attention of the squadron from places where the pirates really were.

Francis H. Gregory, a lieutenant in the navy of the United States, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

Question. In what capacity did you serve in the squadron under the command of Captain Porter, and between what periods?

Answer. I commanded the Grampus; joined the commodore at Key West, on the 3d July, 1823, and continued under him until after my return to the United States, in November, 1823. Previous to my joining Commodore Porter, I was out on a cruise, having sailed from New York in December, 1822, while Commodore Porter was fitting out his squadron, under the orders from the Department, read and annexed to the record.

Ques. On what particular service were you employed during that period? Produce such orders and instructions as you received, relating in any manner to this investigation.

Ans. The Grampus sailed from New York December 30, 1823, for Matanzas; cruised about the Grand Bahama Bank a few days, and arrived at Matanzas January 18, 1823; gave convoy from that port, and touched at Havana the 28th; sailed the same day for the south side of Cuba; experienced a very severe gale from the southward; was disabled and driven into the Bay of Mexico; arrived on the 19th February, at the mouth of the Mississippi; proceeded to New Orleans, where I received on board a new mainmast; sailed under orders from Captain Patterson, read and annexed, with convoy for Tobasco; left the Balize April 24th; anchored off the mouth of the Tobasco May 1st; sailed the 7th for Vera Cruz, with convoy; 9th parted from the convoy, and proceeded directly to Campeachy; continued cruising and giving convoy upon that coast, until want of provisions forced me to go to Havana, where I arrived June 27th, and met the Wild Cat, Lieutenant Skinner, with whom I proceeded to Thompson's Island; a fleet of merchantmen left Havana in company with us; July 3d, arrived at Thompson's Island, where I received Commodore Porter's instructions, dated May 16th, read and annexed, being the first communication I had received from him; July 5th, was dispatched after a pirate; went to Key Vacas, and returned on the 10th to Thompson's Island; I received orders to proceed to Matanzas; sailed on the 16th with a barge; on the 19th dispatched the barge with one of the boats of the Grampus, off Point Yaco, before entering the harbor, to cruise among the keys, and went into Matanzas; between the 20th and 25th July, Lieut. Platt joined me from Thompson's Island, with a barge; sent him the same day to windward to cruise for pirates; continued giving convoy, watching every suspicious vessel in the harbor, of which there were several, and keeping the barges cruising along the coast to windward and leeward, until relieved by Commodore Porter's order of the 16th September; while at Matanzas, received Lieut. Freelon's report of the proceedings with the barges, (read and annexed,) and a letter from the merchants of Matanzas, (read and annexed.)

On the 13th October, left the Island of Cuba; at that time the Porpoise, Wild Cat, Hornet, and Jackall, were upon the coast, at Matanzas or Havana; arrived at Tampico October 19th; on the 20th was taken down with the yellow fever; sailed the 24th with 26 on the sick list; reached Havana on the 6th or 7th November, and sailed on the 12th for Norfolk; while at Matanzas, the Wild Cat, Lieut. Walbert, arrived from the United States; the Terrier or Ferret, Lieut. M'Kean, the Jackall, Lieut. Oellers, Lieut. Ritchie in the Fox, Lieut. Newton in the Beagle, Lieut. Kennon in one of the small schooners, all touched at Matanzas, offering convoy, and in several instances sailing with convoy; but which particular vessels, or the precise periods of their arrival and departure I cannot recollect; all however occurred between the 19th September and the 3d of October, the day on which I left Matanzas for the last time.

Independently of the written instructions received from Commodore Porter when I was going to Matanzas, I received also verbal instructions, in which he stated the importance of the point, the necessity for great activity and vigilance; and was directed to communicate to him in all cases of necessity.

Ques. While under the command of Captain Porter, did you carry on freight any, and what amount of specie?

Ans. When I left Havana for the United States, there was about six or seven thousand dollars put on board by the American consul at Havana, belonging to a merchant at Baltimore, which I landed at Norfolk, and deposited in the Bank of the United States at that place. My proportion of the freight, amounting to about eighty or ninety dollars, was given to the Orphan asylum at Philadelphia, the residue was given to the commodore; that was all the money that was ever shipped on board the Grampus in any foreign port during about 27 months that I commanded her.

Ques. Did any instance occur in which, by delaying your sailing or varying from your course, opportunities would have occurred to carry specie on freight?

Ans. When I left the Balize, under the orders of Captain Patterson, he gave me verbal instructions to go to Tampico by the 15th May, stating that there would be considerable sums of specie there by that time, and that he would make arrangements about it. On my arrival off the coast of Campeachy, I found several American vessels there in a great deal of alarm; the captain of one of them had been murdered by the pirates. In consequence of the defenceless state of the commerce, I determined not to go to Tampico, and wrote to that effect to the consul there, and employed myself in furnishing such protection as I could afford to the vessels in the neighborhood.

In spite of all my efforts, though I had my boats out in shoal water sometimes as far as eighty or a hundred miles from the vessel, they succeeded in several instances. I received a letter from Captain Patterson, under date of the 4th May, informing me he had made arrangements by which, had I gone to Tampico, I might have taken on board three or four hundred thousand dollars. I had a list of the vessels to which I furnished convoy at Campeachy, amounting to more than twenty. While I was at Campeachy, I was also importuned to take on board $40,000, and carry it to the Balize. This I declined, as it would interfere with my other duties. The pirates were carrying on their depredations, and I considered it my duty to protect American commerce and look after the pirates. While there, I ran one vessel on shore, and took another, which I delivered up to the authorities of the place.

Ques. Independently of the transportation of specie, did the general protection of American commerce and property, and the suppression of piracy, require the presence of the vessels of the squadron in the Gulf of Mexico as frequently as they were sent there, and at the places to which they were sent?

Ans. As far as my knowledge extends, it was so; there were numerous piracies committed along the coast of Yucatan, off Tobasco and Alvarado, and apprehensions were generally entertained by the American merchants trading between New Orleans and Tampico.

Ques. Were the vessels of the squadron in the practice of offering convoy to American vessels?

Ans. It was their constant practice. I never knew an instance of its being refused.

Ques. Was everything done by Captain Porter, with the squadron under his command, to suppress piracy, which could be done?

Ans. As far as I know it was.

Ques. Is there any other matter relating to the subject under investigation which you deem material? If so, state it fully.

Ans. Nothing within my recollection.

Thomas H. Stevens, a master commandant in the navy of the United States, being duly sworn, according to law, deposes and says:

Quesion. In what capacity did you serve in the squadron under the command of Captain Porter, and between what periods?

Answer. I commanded the Jackall from early in January, 1823, to July 5th, of the same year; and the Shark, from July 25th, of the same year, till June 10th, 1824.

Ques. On what particular service were you employed during these periods? Produce such orders and instructions as you received, relating to the subject of this inquiry.

Ans. During the first part of the time, I was not cruising under Commodore Porter; I received my first instructions from him on the 11th May; (read and annexed.) The second orders are of the 6th of June; (read and annexed;) and the last orders, while in command of the Jackall, dated the 18th June; (read and annexed.)

I left Aguada in company with Captain Kearney, on the 11th of March; ran down the south side of St. Domingo, giving the coast a strict and careful exam'nation for pirates. From thence, we stretched over to Cuba, and commencing at Cape Mazo, examined very particularly the coast on the south side, to Cape Antonio—having two boats frequently out, and particularly about the bay of Cape Antonio, and arrived at Havana about the end of March.

I went into Havana, and found the alarm very great on account of pirates; gave convoy from there on the 1st of April, to probably fifteen or twenty vessels, and, on the 3d of April, arrived at Thompson's Island, and reported to Commodore Porter. Captain Kearney's report of the 11th of April, 1823, details the events of the cruise. On the 8th, sailed again, in company with the Fox and two barges, with part of the crew of the Peacock, under the command of Captain Cassin. We arrived next day at the Havana, where much alarm prevailed on account of several captures made by the piratical schooner Pilot. On coming out of the port of Havana, I informed Captain Cassin, then off the harbor, of the great excitement prevailing there, and strongly urged to send the barges in pursuit of the piratical vessel. This was done under Lieutenant Stribling: the next day he returned, having captured her. We gave convoy to a large fleet, and then proceeded to leeward, and entered the Colorados at Cape Blanco; commenced and continued an unremitting search after pirates, examining every inlet and bay to Cape Antonio; after examining which most particularly, we returned to Thompson's Island. While within the Colorados, we captured a large launch and a fine felucca, particularly adapted for piratical purposes, being manned and armed with guns of various calibres. Drove the crews ashore, after an action with them, and destroyed their establishment on shore, consisting of five huts. When we left Thompson's Island, we left Commodore Porter preparing boats and men to be dispatched on the same service. On my arrival at Thompson's Island on the 26th of April, I careened and repaired my vessel, took in provisions, and sailed in conformity with my instructions of that date. I was engaged in giving convoy and in cruising to windward of Matanzas after pirates, till the 5th June, when I returned to Thompson's Island, and received my instructions of that date. I obeyed these orders; went to Havana and Matanzas, cruising and giving convoy, and returned to Thompson's Island on the 17th June, where I received my orders of the 18th, and proceeded to the United States, to Washington. On the 29th July, received orders to take command of the Shark, at New York, and on the 3d October sailed from New York, having on board Commodore Rodgers and the surgeons who went out to visit Thompson's Island. On the 27th arrived at Thompson's Island; remained there ten or twelve days; proceeded to the Havana; left there November 6th, and arrived at Norfolk on the 16th.

On the 27th December, I received my orders from Commodore Porter, of that date; sailed from Norfolk, in pursuance of them, on the 31st; arrived at St. Jago on the 7th January, 1824; ran down the south side of Cuba; examined, carefully, the coast to Cape Antonio; and, on the 28th January, arrived off Alvarado, where I landed the gentlemen who had sailed with me from the United States, as the agents of the Bank of the United States. On my arrival at Alvarado, I was informed by the acting vice consul there, that a large amount of American property was detained at the Castle of San Juan de Ulloa, and that the representations of some naval commander were necessary to obtain restitution of it. I, accordingly, ran up to Point Lizardo, and anchored. I then left the vessel and repaired to Alvarado, for the purpose of inquiring into the business. Finding the statement of those who made the representations correct, I was returning to Lizardo, when a heavy north wind compelled me to return. This wind drove the Shark to sea, and I did not rejoin her till four or five days after. I then took with me an agent for the recovery of this property, and, after arriving on board, addressed a letter to General Lamour, the commander of the castle, who immediately restored it. In coming from the castle, the authorities at Vera Cruz seized the property, which made my presence in that place necessary. I got under way and anchored at Sacrificios on the 11th March, and entered into a correspondence with General Victoria, which eventuated in the reference of the matter to the government at Mexico.

Shortly after arriving at Vera Cruz, hostilities commenced between the castle and the city; and, as our vessels were daily arriving there, and liable to capture and detention by either of the contending parties, I remained there, warning them off, and affording them every assistance in my power, till I received a letter from one of the gentlemen whom I had taken out with me, informing me of the failure of their mission. I sailed the next day after the receipt of this letter, and arrived at Tampico on the 3d April. I remained there four or five days, and then sailed for the Havana, where I arrived on the 19th; repaired to Thompson's Island, where I received instructions from Captain Porter to proceed to the United States, which I did, and arrived at New York on the 14th May.

Ques. While under the command of Captain Porter, did you carry any, and what amount of specie, on freight?

Ans. The whole amount of specie which I received on board, was $163,500; and before receiving any money in a foreign port, I always saw that the duties had been regularly paid. Of this amount, $8,000 was received at the Havana, when returning home in the Jackall; $58,000 at Thompson's Island, and $97,500 at Tampico: $10,000 from Tampico, was delivered at Havana; all the rest in the United States. The $8,000 was shipped at Havana, consigned to the house of Goodhue & Co., at New York. The $58,000 was received, by permission from Commodore Rodgers, from Lieutenants Oellers and Rousseau. The $97,500 was shipped by the American consul, Mr. Ingraham, at Tampico.

Ques. What premium or freight did you receive for such transportation, and how was it appropriated?

Ans. For the $8,000 I received 2½ per cent.; for the $58,000 I received 2 per cent., and for the $97,500, 1½ for that landed at Havana, and 2 per cent for that brought to the United States. I received for myself two-thirds; the other third I paid over to Commodore Porter. The commodore never made any demand of me for any of it; it was a voluntary act of mine, in pursuance of the general custom.

Ques. Was any time consumed at the place where the specie was shipped, on the passage, or at the ports where it was delivered, in consequence of being engaged in the transportation of specie, which would otherwise have been specially devoted to the suppression of piracy?

Ans. In no instance did any delay occur for the purpose of taking on board specie; on the contrary, I was requested to wait at Vera Cruz, or to stop off Alvarado, for the arrival of a convoy, which was expected down from Mexico, with two or three million of dollars, which I declined doing, but sailed immediately on receiving the letter I have mentioned, from the gentleman whom I carried out.

Ques. During the period of your being under the command of Captain Porter, did you ever hear, or do you know of any specie being carried on frieght by any vessel on board which he was at the time?

Ans. I do not know that in any case the vessel which carried Commodore Porter's pendant carried any specie. Commodore Porter was never down the gulf when I was with him; he was either employed on the coast of Cuba or at Thompson's Island.

Ques. Did the general objects of the protection of American commerce and property, and the suppression of piracy require, in your opinion, that the vessels of the squadron should go as frequently as they did to the Gulf of Mexico, and to the places to which they were sent?

Ans. They certainly did, according to my opinion.

Ques. Were the vessels in the squadron in the practice of affording convoy to American vessels?

Ans. In every instance where it was required; more frequently than the general orders required it.

Ques. Was everything done by Captain Porter, with the force under his command, which could be done to suppress piracy?

Ans. All that energy and decision could accomplish, was done to attain that object. It appeared to be the principal object of the commodore, and of every officer under his command.

Ques. During the time that you acted under Captain Porter, had you reason to believe that unfounded reports of piracies were circulated in the West Indies?

Ans. I have no doubt but such reports were frequently circulated without the shadow of truth, for the purpose of drawing off the attention of our squadron.

Ques. Is there any other matter relating to the subject of this inquiry, material to mention?

Ans. I know of nothing important.

The court adjourned till half-past 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

TUESDAY, May 17.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: as before.

Master Commandant William B. Finch, again:

Question. During the period of your being under the command of Captain Porter, did you ever hear or know of any specie being carried on freight by any vessel on board of which he was at the time?

Answer. No; his flag was transferred from the John Adams, before she sailed down the gulf, to the Sea Gull. The commodore himself never went down into the bay while I was with him.

Charles W. Skinner, a lieutenant in the navy of the United States, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

Question. In what capacity did you serve in the squadron under the command of Captain Porter, and between what periods?

Answer. I served with Captain Porter from about the 23d December, 1822, till about the 11th of July, 1823, in command of the schooner Wild Cat. I commanded the Porpoise from March, 1824, until Captain Porter left the West India station.

Ques. On what particular service were you employed during these periods? Produce such orders and instructions as you received.

Ans. I was governed by the general instructions, that have been given in evidence, and obeyed them in every particular. I was in company with Commodore Porter until after the arrival of the squadron at Aguada. At that place the squadron was separated, and I continued with the commodore until the 20th March, engaged in the suppression of piracy, particularly between St. Thomas and Sugar Key; we anchored at Sugar Key, where the Beagle was put also under my command, three lieutenants from tha Peacock, and about eighty of the ship's company in the boats of that vessel, with orders to examine from Cayo Romano, in the old Bahama Straits to Matanzas. We landed on the different keys, examined them, boarded all the vessels we fell in with, and arrived at Matanzas on the 20th March. On the same night, in consequence of a report that a piracy had been committed in Escondido, I sailed for that place with the Beagle and the boats of the Peacock in company, examined the place, and found the report to be unfounded. I returned, and off Matanzas fell in with the commodore in his gig. The commodore sailed about the 30th, and left me in command of the Wild Cat and Beagle, to convoy from Matanzas and he Havana twice a week, till further orders, and to examine in the intervening time the creeks and inlets in the neighborhood. From that time till the 2d July, I was constantly engaged in this business, boarding every vessel, and examining every creek. During that period, I believe I gave convoy to about one hundred and eighty sail of vessels, affording all the protection in our power, being constantly at sea. I went over to Thompson's Island, and on the 3d July sailed for Key Vacas, to land marines and artillery; and sailed from thence on the 5th for the United States.

The second cruise was to the coast of Africa, under orders from the Department, dated June 19th, 1824. (Read, and annexed.) Having accomplished the duties given by those orders, boarding on the coast of Africa several vessels engaged in the slave trade, under the French, Spanish, and Danish flags; returned to Cape Messurado, took on board Mr. Gurley, as I was directed, and sailed for the West Indies. On the 15th September, arrived at St. Pierre, Martinico, sailed on the 16th, arrived at St. Thomas the 19th, sailed on the 24th, convoying a ship through the Sail Rock passage. On the 25th, arrived off St. Johns, Porto Rico, and inquired after pirates; finding all quiet in that quarter, I proceeded, and on the 28th landed and examined the Island of Mona.

On the 30th, went to the city of St. Domingo. On the 4th October, anchored off St. Jago de Cuba; during each of these trips kept as near the shore as possible, examining the coast and inlets—proceeded to the Island of Cayman, thence over to Cuba, and went down it till I reached Cape St. Antonio, where I gave chase to a suspicious vessel, and at night dispatched some boats in pursuit of her; the boats found the piratical establishment on the cape, and destroyed it, but were unable to overtake the vessel. Being short of provisions, proceeded to Havana, boarding all the vessels I met with—arrived at Havana on the 13th. On the 17th sailed with convoy; in going out of the harbor, fell in with the Terrier, a barge in company, going in—informed him of the piratical vessel I had fallen in with at Cape St. Antonio, and he immediately went in pursuit, and succeeded in capturing him. On the 19th, having left the convoy, anchored at Matanzas. On the night of the 20th, having borrowed a boat from the shore, sent all my own boats, with all my officers, and as many men as could be spared, to search the piratical haunts about Matanzas. On the 23d, they returned with the piratical schooner Gata, and three piratical boats, as prizes. On the night of the 24th, manned the prize schooner, and sent her out on a cruise. On the 25th, sailed with a convoy from Matanzas. On the 28th fell in at sea with the schooner, proceeded to Thompson's Island, where I arrived on the 31st October. There repaired the vessel, took in provisions, and sailed on the 10th November for Matanzas, having received an order to that purpose from the commodore; arrived at Matanzas on the 11th. On the 13th sailed with a convoy, and, from that time till the 17th December, was constantly occupied in that neighborhood, giving convoy to merchantmen, and with my boats out searching for pirates. On the 18th December, arrived at Thompson's Island, where I joined Commodore Porter. On the 22d, received the order, (read and annexed,) to proceed to the Gulf of Mexico, with which I complied. Sailed on the 23d for the Havana, thence on the 26th for the Gulf of Mexico. On the 31st fell in with an American brig, and convoyed her into Campeachy, there offered convoy, and proceeded to the different places indicated in my orders, offering at each convoy and protection to American commerce. Sailed from Tampico on the 18th March, arrived at Havana on the 31st; there I received an order from Captain Warrington to comply with the previous order, received from Captain Porter, and sailed about the 7th April for New York, where I arrived about the 19th.

Ques. While under the command of Captain Porter, did you receive any and what amount of specie on freight?

Ans. The first specie I carried was in the Wild Cat, from the Havana, $5,000, carried to a vessel which had sailed before me and which I was to convoy. The next time I carried $34,519 from Tampico to the Balize. The next sum I carried was $109,013 from Tampico; $2,000 was landed at Havana, the residue at New York.

Ques. Was it shipped by American merchants, or by whom?

Ans. All that I carried from Tampico was shipped by the American consul; the $5,000 was shipped by the master of an American vessel of Philadelphia.

Ques. What amount of freight did you receive for such transportation, and how was it appropriated?

Ans. The whole amount was between $2,200 and $2,300; one-third was deposited in bank for the commanding officer, the residue was my own.

Ques. Was any time consumed at the places where the specie was shipped, on the passage, or at the places of delivery, in consequence of your being engaged in the transportation of specie, which would otherwise have been specially devoted to the suppression of piracy?

Ans. I did not remain at any of these places longer than I should have done, had there been no specie. I complied strictly with my orders. I was on one occasion offered a considerable sum of money to be carried to New Orleans, but I declined it, as I had no other motive to carry me there.

Ques. Did the general protection of American commerce and property, and the suppression of piracy, require, in your opinion, the presence of an American force in the Gulf of Mexico as frequently as it was sent there, and at the places to which it was sent?

Ans. I conceived it absolutely necessary that an American vessel of war should be in the Gulf of Mexico. I can only speak as to my own vessel, not knowing what other vessels were there or how long.

Ques. Were the vessels attached to the squadron in the practice of affording convoy to American vessels?

Ans. So far as I knew, it was the constant practice.

Ques. Was everything done which could be done by the squadron to suppress piracy?

Ans. Yes; as far as came to my knowledge, no vessels were ever more actively or more disagreeably employed.

Ques. During the time that you were under the command of Captain Porter, had you reason to believe that reports were circulated in the West Indies of piratical acts, which were ascertained to be without any foundation in truth?

Ans. Yes, many; it was constantly the case.

Ques. During that period, did you ever hear or know of any specie being carried on freight by any vessel on board of which Captain Porter was at the time?

Ans. No, I never did; I never heard of his being in the Gulf of Mexico.

Ques. Is there any other matter or thing material to this investigation? If so, state it fully.

Ans. I do not recollect anything further. When in Tampico, the American consul informed me that he had repeatedly written to have an American vessel from the squadron sent down there to carry specie, and that, in consequence of there being none, it became necessary to ship it in English vessels, which made the route more circuitous, and increased the expense.

Charles H. Bell, a lieutenant in the navy of the United States, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

Question. In what capacity did you serve in the squadron under the command of Captain Porter, and for what time?

Answer. I was a lieutenant commandant, commanding the Ferret, from the 8th August, 1824, until his return from the West Indies.

Ques. On what particular service were you employed?

Ans. I received orders from Commodore Porter to proceed from Washington to Thompson's Island, touching at Matanzas, to give protection to our commerce. I sailed about the 26th, and arrived about September 10th; was employed during the whole time that I was under his command, in protecting American commerce, and giving convoy from Matanzas and Havana, and cruising occasionally after pirates, from about Havana to French Key, to the eastward of Matanzas.

Ques. While under the command of Captain Porter, did you carry on freight any, and what amount of specie?

Ans. Never any.

Ques. Were the vessels attached to the squadron in the practice of offering convoy to American vessels?

Ans. It was their constant practice, so far as my knowledge extends. I myself convoyed at least forty or fifty vessels. I never refused convoy but once; that was in Havana. I had received orders to convoy at a certain day from Matanzas, and the vessels which required it could not sail at the time. I was obliged to leave that port.

Ques. Was everything done by the squadron within their power, in the suppression of piracy?

Ans. I believe so.

Ques. During the period that you were under the command of Captain Porter, did you ever know or hear of any specie being carried on freight by any vessel on board of which he was at the time?

Ans. No.

Ques. Is there any other matter material to this inquiry? If so, state it fully.

Ans. I know nothing further that is material.

John P. Zantzinger, a lieutenant in the navy of the United States, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

Question. In what capacity did you serve in the squadron under the command of Captain Porter; and for what length of time?

Answer. I commanded the Weasel from 17th September, 1823, till July 20th, 1824.

Ques. On what particular service were you employed?

Ans. I arrived in the West Indies on the 17th October; went through the Caycus passage; went to Barico, at the east end of Cuba; proceeded through the old Straits of Bahamas to Matanzas; remained there three weeks, giving convoy in and out of the harbor. From thence I proceeded to Havana; found there the Porpoise, Lieut. Ramage, to whom I was ordered to report myself. Thence I proceeded to Key West, and returned to Havana, where I received orders to proceed to the United States. My business on this first cruise was to examine the coast and inlets, in search of pirates, and to give convoy. I sailed for the United States about the 12th December, giving convoy and bringing home specie. Went from New York to Norfolk, where I received orders to proceed to sea, in company with the Spark; sailed July 18th, and proceeded to St. Thomas; proceeded along the south side of Porto Rico, St. Domingo; ran between St. Domingo and Jamaica; thence along the south side of Cuba, round to Cape St. Antonio, giving the whole coast a thorough examination; thence to Key West, where I rejoined the Spark. Sailed in company with the Spark about the 4th March to the Gulf, running along the coast of Yucatan to Cape Catouche; ran into Campeachy, from thence to Alvarado; remained there about three weeks; thence to Point Lizarado; thence to Vera Cruz. I thence proceeded to Tampico, with the annexed order; remained in the harbor near three weeks, affording protection to our commerce. I then sailed, with some specie on board, for Vera Cruz; thence to Alvarado; thence to the Havana, going along the coast from Cape Antonio; thence to Thompson's Island. I there received orders to proceed to New York, and sailed for the United States. During the last cruise, my principal occupation was giving protection to American commerce, and looking after pirates. The reason of my continuing so long in the ports where I remained, was that the American consul, and all the principal merchants, made a request of Lieutenant Newton to permit me to be there, stating, that as the Weasel was small and able to cross the bar, her presence was more important in affording protection to the commerce than the larger vessels, which were compelled to remain outside. At Tampico I was detained near a fortnight, in consequence of an American vessel being attacked.

Ques. While under the command of Captain Porter, what amount of specie did you carry on freight? from what places, and where delivered?

Ans. I carried $197,000; of this I carried $70,000 from Havana to New York. From Tampico and Alvarado, I carried $127,000; of this $55,500 was taken on board in consequence of an American vessel from Philadelphia, who had it on board, running ashore off Tampico. I took it on board, and carried it to Philadelphia; I delivered all the residue at Philadelphia, except $1,000 landed at Havana.

Ques. Was it shipped by American merchants, or whom?

Ans. All the money that I carried was shipped by American merchants.

Ques. What amount of freight did you receive for the transportation, and how was it appropriated?

Ans. I received two per cent. on the whole amount carried; one-third I paid to the commodore as a voluntary act on my part, the residue I retained.

Ques. Was any time consumed at the places where the specie was shipped, on the passage, or at the ports where it was delivered, in consequence of your being engaged in the transportation of specie, which would otherwise have been specially devoted to the suppression of piracy?

Ans. None.

Ques. Did the general protection of American commerce and property, and the suppression of piracy, require, in your opinion, the presence of an American force in the Gulf of Mexico as frequently as it was sent there, and at the places to which it was sent?

Ans. Yes, and much more frequently. Complaints were numerous of the want of a force there.

Ques. Was the procuring of specie the primary or secondary object of your going into that quarter?

Ans. It was entirely secondary.

Ques. Were the vessels of the squadron in the practice of affording convoy to American vessels?

Ans. It was their constant practice wherever it was wanted; I always offered convoy at every port to which I went.

Ques. Was everything done by the squadron which, as you conceive, could be done towards the suppression of piracy?

Ans. It was.

Ques. While you were under the command of Captain Porter, were any reports circulated, without any foundation, of piratical acts?

Ans. Yes, frequently, on the coast of Cuba; such reports were I believe frequently circulated for the purpose of drawing the vessels off.

Ques. Did you ever know of or hear, that any vessel on board which Captain Porter was at the time carried specie on freight?

Ans. I know of no instance, and never heard of any.

Ques. Is there any other matter which you deem material to this inquiry? If so, state it fully.

Ans. Nothing in particular.

David G. Farragut, a lieutenant in the navy of the United States, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

Question. In what capacity did you serve in the squadron under the command of Captain Porter, and for what period of time?

Answer. I joined the squadron on the 4th February, 1823, as an acting lieutenant on board the schooner Grayhound, commanded by Master Commandant John Porter, and afterwards by Lieutenant Kearney, and continued on the station until the commodore returned to the United States in July, 1825.

Ques. On what particular service were the vessels to which you were attached employed?

Ans. The Grayhound was constantly employed, while I was on board her, in the suppression of piracy, and giving convoy on the south side of the Island of St. Domingo and Cuba, and the Mona passage, and on the north side of Porto Rico. I was in the Grayhound till July, 1823, at which time I was transferred to the steam galliot Sea Gull; she wore the pendant of Commodore Porter, and was engaged in cruising for pirates along the coast of Florida; Commodore Porter was taken sick, and the vessel remained at Thompson's Island until he returned home in the summer of 1823.

On the 17th February, the Sea Gull having been repaired, we again sailed for the West Indies; the commodore in the John Adams, in company touching at different places, visited the Island of St. Bartholomews, St. Thomas, St. Kitts, ran down the north side of Porto Rico through the Mona passage, visited the Island of Mona, down the south side of St. Domingo, examined the coast and inlets, retook the schooner Pacification off Jaquemel from a Carthagenian privateer, visited St. Jago de Cuba, then down the coast, examining the coast thoroughly by the Isle of Pines; coasted the island along as far as Matanzas, thence to Thompson's Island. The next day the commodore arrived in the John Adams, and we were dispatched on an expedition under the command of Captain Wilkinson to Cape Antonio, in pursuit of a pirate whom he had chased in there a few days before; the boats entered the Colorados to the windward, and the Sea Gull to leeward, and met about half way; received information from some fishermen that the vessel had sailed for the coast of Yucatan. Having made diligent search, we were joined by the Grayhound, and returned to Thompson's Island; I then left the Sea Gull, and on the 10th June was appointed to the command of the Ferret. I received verbal instructions from Commodore Porter to cruise between Havana, Matanzas, and Thompson's Island, for the purpose of giving convoy twice a week out of Matanzas and Havana, to carry plants from Cuba over to the island, and to be careful to afford every protection to our commerce that might be requested. These orders were punctually obeyed; no convoys were asked which I did not afford, no piracies were complained of. I gave convoys sometimes three times, sometimes four times a week. I continued thus occupied until July 5th, when I received orders to carry a public agent to Nassau, New Providence, and afterwards to proceed to the United States.

Ques. While under the command of Captain Porter, did you carry on freight any, and what amount of specie?

Ans. I carried none.

Ques. Do you know, or did you ever hear, that any was carried in any vessel on board which Captain Porter was at the time?

Ans. No; I never did.

Ques. Was it the practice of the squadron to afford convoy, when required, to American vessels?

Ans. Always, I believe; I never knew an instance to the contrary.

Ques. Was everything done by the squadron for the suppression of piracy, which could be done?

Ans. I think so.

Ques. Had you ever reason to believe that reports were circulated in the West Indies, without any foundation, of piratical acts; and for what purpose?

Ans. I have known many such myself; what the object was, cannot say. Some that I heard, I knew at the time to be false; and false reports were also circulated with regard to the absence of vessels, from the ports of Cuba, to give convoy.

Ques. Do you know, and were you frequently at the ferry, kept by an Englishman named Roberts, near Matanzas?

Ans. Yes, I knew him; was frequently there; obtained, from his plantation, plants for Key West.

Ques. Do you know, or did you ever hear, of that ferry being much resorted to by pirates, or persons having intercourse with them?

Ans. I never did.

Ques. Is there anything further material to this inquiry?

Ans. I know nothing that I conceive important.

The court then adjourned till half-past 10 o'clock, to-morrow morning.

WEDNESDAY, May 18.

The court met, pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: as before.

Ralph Voorhees, a lieutenant in the navy of the United States, being duly sworn, according to law, deposes and says:

Question. In what capacity did you serve in the squadron under the command of Captain Porter; and for what period of time?

Answer. I served on board the Sea Gull, as a lieutenant, from December 26th, 1822, till July 16th, 1823. I then took command of her, and continued in command until July 10th, 1824.

Ques. On what particular service was the Sea Gull employed while you were attached to her, and where?

Ans. I sailed in February, 1823, for the West Indies. The vessel was employed generally in the West Indies, and particularly cruising around the Island of Cuba and through the Bahama Straits, in giving convoy to American vessels, and the suppression of piracy. The commodore was frequently on board the Sea Gull, and I think for half the time that she was out she bore his pendant, which was sometimes shifted to the John Adams and Peacock.

Ques. During that time was any, and what amount of, specie carried on freight in the Sea Gull?

Ans. None was carried.

Ques. Do you know, or did you ever hear, that any was carried in any vessel on board which Captain Porter was at the time?

Ans. None that I know of.

Ques. Was it the practice of the squadron to give convoy to American vessels?

Ans. Always, when required.

Ques. Was everything done which could be effected to suppress piracy?

Ans. I believe all the vessels were actively and judiciously employed for that purpose.

Ques. Had you reason to believe that many unfounded and exaggerated accounts of piracy were circulated in the West Indies?

Ans. Many such reports were circulated, which, on examination, we found to be destitute of any foundation; they were very frequent. I also saw in the papers from the United States the most exaggerated and unfounded statements of piracies.

Ques. Is there anything else material to this investigation within your knowledge? If so, state it fully.

Ans. Nothing.

John H. Lee, a lieutenant in the navy of the United States, being duly sworn, according to law, deposes and says:

Question. In what capacity did you serve in the squadron under the command of Captain Porter, and for what period of time?

Answer. I served as a lieutenant on board the John Adams, from the time she went to the West Indies until about the 25th April, 1824; at that time I took command of the schooner Jackall, and continued in her till November 20th, 1824.

Ques. On what service were the vessels on which you were, particularly engaged during those periods?

Ans. The John Adams joined the squadron at Key West, in August, 1823, and then returned to the United States in consequence of the sickness. About the 17th February, 1824, sailed again from the United States, under the command of Captain Dallas; the particular object in which we were occupied, was cruising for pirates from the windward, down through the islands, till our arrival at Key West, where I left her. On board the Jackall I cruised along the coast of Yucatan and Campeachy, with another schooner in company, in pursuance of Commodore Porter's orders of April 25th (read and annexed), and executed those orders, and made the report of the cruise which has been given in evidence.

Ques. Did the vessels to which you were attached, while under the command of Captain Porter, carry any, and what amount of specie, where from, and to what parts?

Ans. None was carried in either of the vessels, while I was under his command.

Ques. Did the protection of American property and commerce, and the suppression of piracy, require the presence of an American force in the Gulf of Mexico as frequently as it was sent there, and at the places to which it was sent?

Ans. I think it did.

Ques. Were the vessels of the squadron in the practice of affording convoy?

Ans. Always, when asked, as far as I knew; and it was constantly offered.

Ques. Were unfounded or exaggerated reports of piracies common in the West Indies?

Ans. I think that exaggerated reports of piratical acts were very frequent.

Ques. Did you ever know or hear of any specie being carried on freight by any vessel of the squadron on board which Captain Porter was at the time?

Ans. No; I never did.

Ques. Was everything done which could be effected, by the squadron, for the suppression of piracy?

Ans. So far as my opportunities of judging extend, I think Commodore Porter made the best distribution of his force for the attainment of that object.

Ques. Is there any other matter within your knowledge material to this inquiry? If so, state it fully.

Ans. Nothing, that I know of.

John T. Ritchie, a lieutenant in the navy of the United States, being duly sworn, according to law, deposes and says:

Question. In what capacity did you serve in the squadron under the command of Captain Porter, and for what period of time?

Answer. I was a lieutenant on board the Ferret; sailed with the squadron in February, 1823, and continued in her till the July following, when I took command of the schooner Fox, and continued in that capacity until October, 1824.

Ques. On what particular service were those vessels engaged?

Ans. While in the Ferret, cruised around the Island of Porto Rico after some pirates that we had heard of—rejoined the commodore at Aguadilla. The single object of the cruise of the Ferret, while I was on board her, was the suppression of piracy along Porto Rico, St. Domingo, Cuba, the Colorados to Key West. After I took command of the Fox, I received the orders dated July 19, 1823, (read and annexed,) was then ordered to join Lieut. Kennon, with whom I had cruised after pirates along the north coast of Cuba; afterwards received the orders of August 5, (read and annexed,) and proceeded to the coast of Yucatan, executed them, and made my report of August 29, which has been given in evidence. I afterwards proceeded to Matanzas and Havana, and on my return to Key West came home to the United States, under orders of September 16, (read and annexed.) In December following returned to the West Indies, and cruised under the orders of Captain Wilkinson, (read and annexed,) until recalled to Key West in April following. Immediately on reaching the island received the orders of April 16, 1824, (read and annexed,) and proceeded forthwith in execution of them. After my return I received the orders of April 25, (read and annexed,) and after executing them returned to Key West, and to the United States in October following.

Ques. While under the command of Captain Porter, did the vessels to which you were attached carry on freight any and what amount of specie; from and to what ports?

Ans. During my first cruise I took on board, at various times, about $40,000 for the United States, received on board at Havana; on the last cruise the only money I received was at Tampico, as I was leaving that place, about $20,000, for Havana. Of this, $3,000 was brought to the United States and delivered at Washington.

Ques. What freight did you receive for such transportation, and how was it appropriated?

Ans. I received, I think, 2½ per cent. on the first money I brought home, and 1½ per cent. on that brought from Tampico. One-third was given to Commodore Porter, and the residue reserved by me.

Ques. Was this money shipped by American merchants, or by whom?

Ans. It was shipped through the American consuls at Havana and Tampico.

Ques. Did the general interest of American commerce and property, and the suppression of piracy, require the presence of an American force in the Gulf of Mexico as frequently as it was sent there, and at the places to which it was sent?

Ans. I think so.

Ques. Did the transportation of the specie you carried interfere in any manner with your attention to the suppression of piracy, or protecting American commerce?

Ans. It did not.

Ques. Was everything done by the squadron to suppress piracy, which could be effected?

Ans. I believe it was, so for as I was capable of judging.

Ques. Is there anything further, within your knowledge, material to the present inquiry? If so, state it.

Ans. Nothing further, than that circumstances occurred at Tampico in regard to the detention, for forty days, of an American vessel, which I succeeded in having released; which showed, beyond doubt, the necessity for having a man-of-war in that neighborhood for the protection of American commerce.

Charles Boarman, a lieutenant in the navy of the United States, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

Question. In what capacity did you serve in the squadron under the command of Captain Porter, and for what period of time?

Answer. As lieutenant, I commanded the schooner Weasel, from the 20th July, 1824, till the return of Commodore Porter.

Ques. On what particular service were you engaged during that period of time?

Ans. From the time of my arrival at St. Barts, on the 15th August, I was employed during the whole time in convoying and cruising for pirates. Went to Crab Island in pursuit of pirates, captured a boat; the pirates escaped on shore. In September sailed from Havana for the Gulf of Mexico, convoying three American vessels; arrived at Campeachy; sailed to Alvarado, and made my report of the 5th December, (read and annexed;) thence sailed to Tampico, inquiring after pirates, and furnishing protection to our commerce; and having fulfilled my orders, took on board specie for the United States, arrived at the Havana, and made my report of the 21st January, 1825.

Ques. During this time, what amount of specie did you carry on freight, from, and to, what ports?

Ans. I carried about $65,000 from Tampico, shipped for New York: about $20,000 of it was subject to the order of a merchant at Havana, and was there transferred to an English frigate; of this, about $14,000 was shipped by an American house, and a part of the money was shipped by Spaniards. At Havana from three to four thousand dollars was put on board, and landed at Norfolk.

Ques. What amount of freight was paid for this transportation, and how was it appropriated?

Ans. About $1,200 was paid; one-third I gave to Commodore Porter, and the residue I retained.

Ques. Did this carrying of specie interfere in any manner with your attention to the suppression of piracy, and the protection of American commerce?

Ans. Not in the least. I was offered money at Campeachy to carry to the United States, but would receive none until I had completed my cruise, and was on the eve of returning to the United States; and I sailed as soon as I should have done had I carried no specie.

Ques. Did the general protection of American property and commerce, and the suppression of piracy, require the presence of American vessels-of-war in the Gulf of Mexico as frequently as they were sent there, and at the places to which they were sent?

Ans. I think so. During the period of from two to three months that I was there, there was no other vessel of the squadron there.

Ques. Was everything done by the squadron which could be done for the suppression of piracy?

Ans. My opinion is, that all was done which could be done to suppress it.

Ques. Is there any other matter within your knowledge material to this inquiry?

Ans. Nothing.

Charles T. Platt, a lieutenant in the navy of the United States, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

Question. In what capacity did you serve in the squadron under the command of Captain Porter, and for what period of time?

Answer. I served in 1823 in the Hornet, afterwards in command of a barge, and on board a merchant vessel employed as a decoy, and during the last year in command of the Beagle.

Ques. On what particular service were you employed?

Ans. The particular objects in which I was engaged were the offering protection to our commerce, and the suppression of piracy. Cruising in an open barge at one time sixty-eight days on the northeast side of Cuba. My last cruise in the Beagle was principally confined to the passages in the neighborhood of St. Thomas, under orders of August 4th, read and annexed. I was constantly cruising and giving convoy. While on that station, there was not a single vessel robbed, or an attempt made. in the neighborhood.

Ques. Had you any concern in the transportation of specie?

Ans. I never carried any. I was offered some on one occasion, but did not take it, not thinking the vessel I commanded a suitable one, and the object being inconsiderable.

Ques. Do you conceive that the squadron did everything which could be accomplished towards the suppression of piracy?

Ans. I do.

Ques. Is there anything further within your knowledge material to this inquiry?

Ans. Nothing further.

John Mountain, Esq., being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

Question. Were you in the Island of Cuba during the period that Commodore Porter commanded the American squadron in the West Indies, and in what capacity?

Answer. I was; in the capacity of vice American commercial agent.

Ques. Are the documents now shown you written by you?

Ans. I believe they are copies of communications made by me to Mr. Warner.

Ques. Do you conceive the sources from which you obtained the information contained in them deserving of confidence?

Ans. I certainly do, most of it from declarations on oath, and the residue from respectable houses at Matanzas, and merchants intimately acquainted with the trade of that country.

Ques. How many and what American men-of-war touched at the Island of Cuba during the year 1824, to the best of your recollection, carrying specie on freight?

Ans. I cannot answer as to the number, nor am I able to name the vessels, not knowing them distinctly; generally speaking, however, all the vessels on the station of a large class. Captain Kennedy in the Hornet refused, and Lieutenants Shubrick and Ramage also refused to carry any. I do not mean to say that this was their sole occupation. The communications I made to Mr. Warner were made in consequence of the clamor of American merchants and masters, who complained of the want of convoy.

Ques. For what length of time were the vessels of the squadron absent, without giving convoy at the Havana?

Ans. For several weeks at a time. This occurred, I think, not more than once, and that was last summer. This long absence produced the clamor that I have spoken of. There is no American merchant at Havana who did not know and believe what I have stated in those communications. I understand that the vessels of the squadron had been removed by the orders of the government, on account of the sickly season, which was a prudent step. I do not mean that the officers of the squadron did not comply with their instructions, but it was known at Havana that the neigborhood was for some time deserted by them. The Americans carry on some trade in the Gulf of Mexico, and their remittances from that quarter are made both in produce and specie.

Ques. On hearing the general complaints of the merchants, did you make any inquiry as to the disposal of the force under Commodore Porter, and what was the information received?

Ans. I did inquire on one or two occasions when vessels touched there, and was shown the instructions to go to the Gulf of Mexico to protect the commerce, and touch at different ports there.

Ques. Did you know anything of the nature of Commodore Porter's instructions?

Ans. I know nothing of them.

Ques. Was the conduct of those officers who refused to take specie approved of or censured by the merchants?

Ans. Much approved of.

Ques. When the merchants complained of the want of protection, did you inform Captain Porter or any other officer of those complaints?

Ans. I did not inform Captain Porter, as I believe he was at that time in the United States, nor do I think I made any formal communication on the subject, as I thought it was unnecessary, as I believed every officer would do his duty.

Ques. Was the conduct of those officers who carried specie disapproved of?

Ans. Yes, it was.

Ques. Did you ever act as agent, or in any manner aid in procuring specie, to be carried in the public vessels?

Ans. I have done so.

Ques. By the expression in your letter of October 30th, "the thirst for making money prevails with others as well as those of the Island of Cuba," did you mean to apply it to the officers generally, or to any particularly?

Ans. That expression was not originally used by me, it was the general cry at Havana, and I understood it to apply to all those officers who had anything to do with the transportation of specie.

The court then adjourned till 11 o'clock, to-morrow morning.

THURSDAY, May 19.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: as before. The judge advocate submitted to the court a communication from the Navy Department, which being read, was annexed to the record, and marked K.

The court then adjourned to meet at Gadsby's Hotel, in the city of Washington, at one o'clock to-day.

The court met at Gadsby's Hotel, pursuant to the adjournment of this morning. Present: as before, and adjourned to meet at the same place to-morrow morning, at 10 o'clock.

FRIDAY, May 20.

The court met pursuant to adjournment of yesterday. Present: as before. The judge advocate read and submitted to the court sundry documents, &c., which were read and annexed to the record. The reading of them continued until after 3 o'clock, and the court then adjourned until to-morrow morning, at 9 o'clock.

SATURDAY, May 21.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: as before, and proceeded to the consideration of the report to be made to the Department. At 3 o'clock the court adjourned till 12 o'clock on Monday.

MONDAY, May 23.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of Saturday, and proceeded to the further consideration of the report, which was agreed upon and signed, and annexed to the record. The court adjourned till to-morrow morning, at ten o'clock.

TUESDAY, May 24.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. The judge advocate was instructed by the court to transmit the record to the Department, and inform the Secretary that the court, having finished the business before it, awaited his further orders. A communication was received from the Secretary dissolving the court, annexed and marked L, whereupon the court adjourned sine die.

I.

To Captain Isaac Chauncey, president of the court of inquiry, now sitting at the Navy yard, Washington:

I have received the letter of the judge advocate, transmitting the proceedings of the court, in relation to the landing of a part of the naval forces, under the command of Captain David Porter, in the Island of Porto Rico, in November last.

I am also apprised, that Captain Porter has entered his protest against the competency of the court, and declined taking further part in its proceedings, and that it has nothing before it.

Circumstances, connected with the inquiry into the manner in which the naval forces of the United States, under the command of Captain David Porter, were employed in the suppression of piracy, render it expedient that that inquiry should not fail or be defeated, because the officer who requested it does not think proper to pursue it before this court. You are therefore hereby directed to proceed in the inquiry indicated in the precept, according to its terms, notwithstanding the objections taken by Captain Porter. You will inquire into the manner in which the squadron under the command of Captain Porter has been employed, during the period of his command, and report to this Department the facts; and whether the said forces have been employed in the suppression of piracy in the most effective manner in which they could be employed, in conformity with the orders and instructions from this Department; or whether they have been engaged in objects of inferior moment, to the injury of the public service: all which you will transmit to this Department, to be submitted to the President of the United States, for his consideration.

Herewith, you will receive a list of the witnesses to whom orders have been given to report themselves to the court, and such documents as appear to be connected with the subject of inquiry shall be submitted as soon as they can be prepared.

Should it appear, in the progress of the investigation, that other testimony within the control of the Department will be required, it shall be furnished with as little delay as practicable.

Given under my hand, and the seal of the Navy Department of the United States, at the city of [L. S.] Washington, this tenth day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, and of the independence of the United States the forty-ninth.

To Isaac Chauncey, Esq., president of the naval court of inquiry, now in session at the Navy yard at Washington:

SIR: I have received a letter from Richard S. Coxe, Esquire, judge advocate of the court, dated the 18th inst., in which he informs me "that the court has completed the examination of all the witnesses who have appeared before it, and inquiring whether any objection exists to the adjournment of the court to some other place more convenient than the Navy yard, for the completion of the business."

It is not perceived that any inconvenience or impropriety can result in the present situation of the business before the court, from a change in the place of meeting. You are, therefore, hereby authorized, should the court consider it expedient so to do, to adjourn to any other public place within the limits of the city of Washington, taking care to give proper notice of the change, and hereafter to hold your meetings at the place to which you shall have adjourned.

I am respectfully, &c.,

SAM'L L. SOUTHARD.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 24, 1825.

SIR: The letter of the judge advocate, of this date, transmitting the record of the proceedings of the court of inquiry, in the case of Captain David Porter, has been received.

The Department has no further documents to communicate. The court is, therefore, hereby dissolved, and the officers composing it will resume their respective stations.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

SAM'L L. SOUTHARD.

Com. ISAAC CHAUNCEY, President Court of Inquiry. Present.

To Isaac Chauncey, Esquire, captain in the navy of the United States:

It having been made to appear to the President of the United States, that on or about the fourteenth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, David Porter, Esquire, a captain in the navy of the United States, then in command of the naval forces of the United States in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico, did, with a part of the military force under his command, forcibly land upon the Island of Porto Rico, a part of the dominions of his Catholic Majesty the King of Spain, then and still at peace and in amity with the Government of the United States, and did then and there commit acts of hostility within the territories and against the subjects of the said King of Spain:

The President of the United States has deemed an inquiry into the conduct of the said David Porter on that occasion, as well as into the causes which led to the same, to be necessary and proper.

And whereas certain representations have been made to the Government of the United States, in regard to the employment of the naval forces of the United States, in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico, setting forth in substance, that in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, the said naval forces were not employed in the suppression of piracy in the most effective manner, but were employed in the transportation of specie and of other objects of inferior moment, to the neglect of the public interests; and the said David Porter, considering his conduct and character, as the commander of said forces, to be thereby implicated, has requested of this Department that an inquiry be made into the truth of said representations:

The President of the United States, in consideration of the premises, has charged me to convene a court of inquiry for the purpose of examining into the matters aforesaid.

You are therefore hereby ordered to proceed to the Navy yard at the city of Washington, on or before the second day of May next, to act as a member of said court, and to officiate as the president thereof.

Orders are also transmitted to Captain William M. Crane, and Captain George C. Read, to appear at the time and place aforesaid, and Richard S. Coxe, Esquire, is also appointed judge advocate, and will report himself to you in that capacity at the time and place aforesaid.

And the said court is hereby required to convene and organize at the said Navy yard at Washington, on the said second day of May, and is authorized and directed to summon before it such persons as may be deemed necessary to give information touching the matters aforesaid; and is also empowered, authorized and directed, diligently and strictly to inquire into the said matters, to make a statement of the facts in relation to the same, as they shall appear to the court, and particularly to examine into and report the causes which led to the conduct of the said David Porter at the Island of Porto Rico before mentioned, and to ascertain and report whether the naval forces of the United States were employed in the most effective manner in the suppression of piracy, or in objects of inferior moment, to the neglect of the public interests: all of which you will transmit to this Department, to be submitted to the President of the United States for his consideration. And for your so doing, this shall be to you, and to all concerned, a sufficient warrant.

Given under my hand, and the seal of the Navy Department of the United States, at the city of [L. S.] Washington, this nineteenth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, and of the independence of the United States the forty-ninth.

(Signed) SAM'L L. SOUTHARD.

The court having maturely deliberated upon the precept, the communication from the honorable the Secretary of the Navy, dated the tenth instant, and the evidence which has been submitted, agree in the following report:

The court, in obedience to the precept and instructions of the honorable the Secretary of the Navy, having inquired into the manner in which the squadron under the command of Captain Porter has been employed, during the period of his command; and whether the said forces have been employed in the suppression of piracy, in the most effective manner in which they could be employed, in conformity with the orders and instructions from the Department of the Navy, or whether they have been engaged in objects of inferior moment, to the injury of the public service; and having maturely considered the testimony which has been laid before the court, reports the following statement as the result of this investigation:

It appears to the court, that in the year 1822, piracy had been organized into a system in the West India seas, preying upon the commerce of every country trading in that quarter.* In consequence of these excesses, an act of Congress was passed early in the succeeding session, "authorizing an additional naval force for its suppression." This law appears to have been acted upon in both Houses with great promptness,† and to have been approved on the 20th December, 1822.‡ By this act the sum of $160,000 was appropriated for the purchase and construction of such vessels as might be deemed suitable for that particular object, and to fit and equip them for immediate service.

In the preparation of this force, Commodore Porter was personally and actively employed, and such dispatch was used, that on the 15th February the squadron, consisting of the Peacock sloop of war, the steam galliot Sea Gull, the Grayhound of 65 tons, the Shark of about 175 tons, the Ferret of 51 tons, the Fox of 51 tons, the Jackall of 47 tons, the Wild Cat of 48 tons, the Terrier of 61 tons, the Weasel of 53 tons, the Beagle of 52 tons, and the ship Decoy, sailed from Hampton Roads.

The instructions from the Hon. Smith Thompson, the Secretary of the Navy, to Commodore Porter, dated February 1, 1823, state the objects for which the squadron under his command had been equipped, and the directions he was to pursue in the attainment of those ends. These objects appear to be the suppression of piracy—the affording effectual protection to the citizens and commerce of the United States—the suppression of the slave trade, and the transportation of specie to the United States.*

In these instructions it was specially enjoined upon Commodore Porter to observe the utmost caution, in protecting our commerce against all unlawful interruption, and in guarding the rights both of persons and property of the citizens of the United States, not to encroach upon the rights of others, and to conduct himself in his intercourse with any foreign power with as much moderation and forbearance as is consistent with the honor of the country and the just claims of its citizens. The cultivation of harmony and a good understanding with any foreign naval force engaged in the suppression of piracy, is strongly recommended. The establishment of a depot at Thompson's Island or Key West, is likewise directed in the exercise of a proper discretion

It is particularly enjoined by the Department upon Commodore Porter to announce his arrival and object to the authorities of the Island of Cuba, and to obtain as far as practicable their co-operation, or at least their favorable and friendly support.

Another subject to which the attention of the squadron is particularly called, is, the protection of the convoy of specie from Vera Cruz and the Bay of Mexico, generally, to the United States. One vessel at least, is directed to be kept on this service, to be at or near Vera Cruz, during the healthy season of the year, and to be relieved as occasion shall require, both for the convoy of trade and to bring specie to the United States, confining the transportation to the United States only.

On the 26th February, Commodore Porter issued his general instructions to his different officers, for their direction and government. These instructions are in substance a transcript of those received by him from the Department, more minute in their details, but varying from them in no essential particular.

The principal object of the expedition being the suppression of piracy, which had assumed, in the seas designed for the sphere of his operations, an appearance of system and organization, and an extent which required the utmost vigor and vigilance to break it down, Commodore Porter appears, from the moment of his appointment to the command of the squadron, to have devoted his attention most zealously to the accomplishment of that object. After arriving in the West Indies, and dividing his force into separate detachments, they were dispatched in various directions in pursuit of pirates and piratical establishments.

The letter from Commodore Porter to Mr. Warner, the American commercial agent, at Havana, dated "off Matanzas, March 26th, 1823," affords a brief sketch of his proceedings to that date. He says: "I am now bound into Matanzas to wait for the boats of this ship, (the Peacock,) which, with the greater part of the crew and some small schooners, have been near a week absent among the Keys, on the south side of the Old Straits. We have examined all the Keys on the other side, and have thoroughly sounded the north side of Porto Rico, St. Domingo, and Cuba, as far down as Cayo Confites. I have sent small vessels down the north side of these islands, to examine every place where a pirate would be likely to be found, and have dispatched the Shark to scour the coast from Caraccas to La Vera Cruz. I have made the most of the force under my command."

The instructions to Lieutenant M. C. Perry, dated at Aguada, March 11th, 1823, sufficiently show the nature of the service on which the Shark was especially dispatched to the Gulf of Mexico.

The report made by Commodore Porter to the Secretary of the Navy, under date of the 28th March, 1823, exhibits a view of the difficulties to which he had been subjected, what had been done up to that period, and the employments of his squadron. About the beginning of April he arrived at Thompson's Island or Key West.

In addition to the more active operations of the squadron in the accomplishment of the objects of the expeditions, communications were made to the constituted authorities, in obedience to the instructions from the Department; the objects and designs of the government were fully and distinctly announced, and the co-operation of the local authorities requested. † A good understanding appears to have been assiduously cultivated with the commanders and officers of a British squadron at that time in the West Indies, which successfully furthered the objects in view, and was productive of mutual advantage. ‡

It appears that when Commodore Porter sailed from the United States, several vessels of war were cruising in the seas to which he was destined, to whom orders were dispatched to report themselves to him, and to place themselves under his command, to aid in the execution of the duties enjoined on him. This, however, did not take place, and the immediate consequence resulting from their absence was the inability of Commodore Porter, with the force at his disposal, fully to execute all the objects which he had contemplated. The explanation of this circumstance is given in the letters from the Secretary of the Navy, of June 7th, 1823.

During the continuance, however, of this state of things, the operations of the squadron were necessarily more limited than had been originally designed; and a portion of the vessels, instead of being actively engaged in pursuing pirates into the different haunts in which they took refuge, were diverted from this object, for which they were specially equipped, to the not less important one of affording convoy to merchant vessels.

In consequence, also, of the very limited number of men attached to the squadron, it became necessary to have the Peacock sloop-of-war and Decoy laid up at Key West, and their officers and crews were employed for a time in the smaller vessels and barges. A portion of the force was, also, necessarily occupied in the erection of suitable buildings, and in preparing the island for the reception and accommodation of the forces employed in the expedition. These various circumstances did unquestionably operate to divert the squadron from the suppression of piracy; but it appears to the court that the affording of convoy to the merchant vessels, and the preparing accommodations at the island, cannot be considered as objects of inferior moment, or which the public service would permit to be lost sight of, or even postponed.

It likewise appears to the court, that from the period that this squadron arrived in the West Indies, the pirates changed, in a great degree, both their character and their haunts. Instead of cruising in open day, in vessels of considerable magnitude, they abandoned this open and avowed system of piracy, and for some considerable period of time, until a new system of operations could be organized, either entirely disappeared, or resorted to new places for the carrying on their depredations.

Immediately upon the arrival of Commodore Porter at Thompson's Island, he commenced the necessary works on shore, and an expedition was prepared and dispatched under the command of Captain Cassin, in quest of a supposed pirate, who had been seen a few days previous in the neighborhood of the Island of Cuba. The reports of Lieutenant Stribling, who succeeded in effecting in a very gallant manner the capture of the vessel which had been the object of suspicion, dated the 8th April, 1823, of Captain Cassin of the 9th of the same month, and of Commodore Porter of the 16th, exhibit a full and correct account of their several operations during the intervening period of time.

The peculiar character of the service in which the squadron was employed, has been fully detailed in the reports made to the Department and in the testimony submitted to the court. A large portion of the officers and men was employed in the small schooners and in open boats—in a severe climate—exposed to the heat of a tropical sun by day, and to the not less dangerous dews and exhalations at night. The vessels themselves, from their size, were destitute of suitable accommodations, and the operations in which they were engaged necessarily imposed incessant fatigue and constant exposure. One fact may be deserving of particular notice, as exhibiting a specimen of the nature of this service. It is in evidence before the court that Lieutenant Platt was employed for sixty-eight successive days in an open barge, on the northwest coast of Cuba, in the examination of the inlets, bays, keys, and other places of piratical resort. Two of the schooners were occupied in giving convoy off the Havana, which were relieved by others whenever required. The barges under Captain Cassin were engaged in a laborious and critical search after pirates and piratical establishments; and during this period all the disposable force under the command of Commodore Porter appears to have been actively occupied in the important objects entrusted to his care.

On the 24th April, Commodore Porter, after detailing the circumstances attending an expedition in which he had been engaged, states his belief, that there was not at that time a pirate afloat on that part of the coast of Cuba (Matanzas) larger than an open boat, and even that is doubtful. About the same period, Captain Cassin was employed in the Fox, and with the barges, in a careful examination of all that part of the coast of Cuba to the westward of Havana, through the reefs, and in the inlets; in the course of which two piratical vessels were pursued and captured, and their establishments on shore, consisting of five huts, destroyed—the pirates themselves succeeding in effecting their escape, in consequence of the nature of the ground, which rendered a continuation of the pursuit on shore impracticable.

On the 10th of May, Commodore Porter reports his proceedings during the intervening time, and the operations in which the squadron were then engaged. The result was "the capture of a piratical schooner and a very fine felucca, the destruction of one on shore, the burning of three schooners in the Rio Palmas, and about a dozen houses in the different establishments to leeward of Bahia Honda, and inside of the Colorados reefs; and what," he continues, "will be of no little importance in all our future operations, a most thorough and intimate acquaintance with the whole line of coast from Cayo Blanco, in the east, down to Cape Antonio, in the west."

Another expedition was immediately dispatched under the command of Lieutenant Watson, who, after a strict examination of the coasts and islands from Cayo Francis to Cayo Blanco, in the vicinity of Cape Hycacos, discovered in Siguapa Bay a piratical schooner, which, after a gallant action, peculiarly destructive to the pirates, he succeeded in capturing, without having sustained on his part the slightest injury. His report of the expedition, dated July 11th, contains a narrative of the circumstances.

During the same period, two of the schooners, under the command of Lieutenant Skinner, were engaged in giving convoy from Havana; two were careened at Thompson's Island; and such was the want of men that it became impossible to man all the barges, some of which were, consequently, laid up.

On the 14th May, the Peacock sailed from Thompson's Island, to relieve the Shark in the Gulf of Mexico, in pursuance of the instructions of the 7th May. The particulars of this cruise are detailed by Captain Cassin in his testimony before the court.

So successfully had the squadron during this period accomplished the objects for which it had been sent, that, on the 19th May, Commodore Porter felt himself authorized to state to the Department that "not a single piratical act had been committed on the coast of Cuba since he had organized and arranged his forces."

On the 22d of the same month, he states that he is "left at Thompson's Island alone with the Sea Gull, one small schooner being engaged in the protection of commerce off Havana; another at Matanzas; two coming in for repairs, and all the others cruising for pirates on the south side of Cuba, and in the Old Straits of Bahama." Early in June, accounts having been received that a piratical schooner had captured two vessels on the south side of Cuba, the Grayhound, under command of Lieutenant Kearney, was dispatched in pursuit; whose report of his cruise is dated August 10th.

At this period, such was the incessant occupation of the squadron under command of Commodore Porter, so widely dispersed, and such its deficiencies in strength, that he was compelled to discontinue for a time the practice of giving convoy off Havana, and to bestow a more undivided attention to the pursuit and destruction of pirates. The continual presence of a vigilant force had rendered the north coast of Cuba comparatively safe from their depredations, and they had retired to other scenes, into which it became necessary to follow them.

On the 14th June, Lieutenant Newell, in the Ferret, sailed on a cruise to Trinidad, on the south side of Cuba. In the course of a few days, he fell in with an armed piratical barge, and captured two boats, the barge escaping up a lagoon in which it was impracticable to continue the pursuit. The particulars of the expedition appear in his report of June 25th.

In July, the Grampus, under the command of Lieutenant Gregory, arrived at Thompson's Island, and joined the force under Commodore Porter: the details of his previous operations appear in his report of the 3d July.

Lieutenant Ritchie was then dispatched to the coast of Yucatan, under orders of July 8th, to ascertain the situation and character of a supposed piratical establishment in that quarter; and on the 29th August reported the circumstances of his expedition.

Shortly after the transactions that have been detailed, the yellow fever made its appearance at Thompson's Island, and in the squadron. The fatal consequences are stated in the report made by the Secretary of the Navy to the President of the United States, under date of the 21st September, 1823, and in the reports of Commodore Rodgers, and the physicians who accompanied him to make an examination of the island, annexed to the record. Commodore Porter himself, by authority of the Department, and suffering from the effects of an attack of the fever, left the West India seas, with a considerable portion of his force, and returned to the United States, as a necessary measure for the restoration of the health of the squadron. To such an extent had this disease carried its ravages, that it was considered prudent to direct the John Adams and Peacock to keep in company during their homeward route, for the purpose of affording mutual protection.

The general result of the operations of this season may be found in the report made to the Department, by Commodore Porter, on the 19th November. In this paper, it is stated that, "on the arrival of the squadron at Cuba, piracy was found in full force: but by the extraordinary activity and diligence of the officers and men under his command, it was in less than two months as effectually suppressed as it will be for several years." It is further stated: "At present I have no knowledge of the existence of any piratical establishment, vessels or boats, or of a pirate afloat in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico. They have all been burned, taken, destroyed, or driven to the shore."

In reviewing the operations of the squadron during this period of time, it appears to the court that Commodore Porter, and the forces under his command, were fully entitled to the high commendations bestowed on them by the Department, in the letter of the 28th October, 1823.

During the absence of Commodore Porter in the United States, the evidence before the court throws but comparatively little light upon the general operations of the squadron. By the instructions from the Department, of October 28th, Commodore Porter was directed, if the state of his health would permit, to take upon himself the general superintending direction of the equipment of the vessels of his squadron, then at Washington and Norfolk. It appears that the Peacock, John Adams, Sea Gull, Beagle, Grampus, Wild Cat, Weasel, and Porpoise, were in the United States during different portions of that time, undergoing repairs and recruiting their crews, and as soon as they could be equipped, most of these small vessels resumed their stations, and returned to the accomplishment of the general duties enjoined on them.*

Commodore Porter sailed in the month of February, in the John Adams. From the testimony of Captain Dallas, and the report of Commodore Porter, of April 8th, it appears that she touched at St. Bartholomews, St. Christophers, and St. Thomas; examined the south coast of Porto Rico, looking in at the Dead Man's Chest, and Ponce, touching at Mona, St. Domingo, Beata, and Kingston, making diligent inquiries and examinations for piratical vessels, and offering convoy and protection to vessels of all nations from piratical aggressions.

By the letters of the Secretary of the Navy, of May 17th, 1824, and May 31st, 1824, it appears that considerable difficulties and delays in preparing an additional force had been experienced. This arose from the late period of the session of Congress at which the appropriation bill was passed. It became impossible, before an advanced period of the season, to commence preparing those vessels which it had been designed to unite to the squadron. It is to this circumstance that the unexpected absence of the Hornet and Porpoise, from the West India seas, is attributed.

During the month of April, an expedition was detached under command of Captain Wilkinson, in quest of pirates, and the report of that officer, dated the 24th of that month, details his operations. Lt. John H. Lee, with the Jackall and Wild Cat, sailed on the 26th April, and on the 12th May reports the circumstances attending his cruise. The John Adams was dispatched to the Gulf of Mexico, and her operations in that quarter are stated in the testimony of Captain Dallas. The Sea Gull, Terrier, Spark, Grampus, and Ferret, appear to have been in the neighborhood of Cuba and Thompson's Island, furnishing convoy, and engaged in the pursuit of pirates. On the 28th May, Commodore Porter informs the Department that the fever had made its appearance at Thompson's Island, and that he purposed removing the principal part of his forces to the north, about the middle of the succeeding month. This letter appears to be the only notification sent to the Department of such intention, and it was not received at Washington until June 24th, the day on which Commodore Porter reached the same place, on his return from the West Indies, as appears by his letter of the 25th of that month. On the 19th July, he is directed to dispatch the Shark, Grampus, and Spark, to their station, as speedily as possible, and they, as well as other vessels, received orders to that effect.

On the 14th October, the Secretary of the Navy informs Commodore Porter that "it is deemed expedient by the Executive that you return as speedily as possible to your station in the John Adams." On the 21st October he was again ordered to repair to his station, and on the 24th of the same month he proceeded to sea in the John Adams. Immediately after his arrival in the West Indies, the occurrence took place at Foxardo, which has already been fully detailed in the report made by this court in the first branch of the inquiry directed to be made, and which is considered as wholly unconnected with this investigation. A minute examination was again made of the south coast of Cuba, which being effected, the John Adams repaired to Thompson's Island. An expedition was immediately organized, and proceeded, under the command of the commodore in person, in quest of pirates. Before his return from this expedition, orders were received, dated the 27th December, directing his return to the United States, with which, as soon as the officers and men of the John Adams, engaged in the last mentioned expedition returned to their vessel, he complied.

At the time that Commodore Porter left the West India seas in June, 1824, the schooners Ferret and Terrier, with a barge, were left to cruise between Thompson's Island, Havana, and Matanzas, and they appear to have been actively occupied during his absence in giving convoy from Havana and Matanzas, and in exploring the neighboring coasts for pirates. Other vessels occasionally arrived in that vicinity during the same interval, and were, for periods of different length, employed for the same objects. The Beagle was engaged in cruising and giving convoy in various directions in the neighborhood of St. Thomas, and appears to have kept that quarter perfectly safe from piratical depredations. In another quarter the Weasel was accomplishing the same ends.

* General Orders, of November 8, 1823. Letter from the Secretary of the Navy, December 3, 1823.

The absence of many of the officers engaged in the squadron during the summer of 1824—the want of official reports of their several operations, and the withdrawal of Commodore Porter from any participation in the investigation, have rendered it impracticable to detail, with as much particularity as could be wished, the daily movements of the various vessels. A reference to the orders annexed to the record will show, in addition to the statements already made, the duties respectively assigned to them. So far, however, as the evidence reaches, it appears to the court that the force was judiciously distributed and actively engaged.

The testimony which appears to conflict most with this statement, is that of Messrs. Randall and Mountain, which will be found in the record. Mr. Randall appears to have been in the Island of Cuba, with the exception of a short interval, from the 3d May until the 9th November, 1824. During this time he was much occupied in attending to the general duties of his mission; part of the time sick, and during the whole of it in a situation to hear all the rumors which might be in circulation in regard to piratical depredations. Most of the information which he has communicated, appears to have been derived from the representations of others; and however implicitly the court would feel disposed to rely upon the accounts given by that gentleman of facts which fell under his immediate notice, it cannot extend that confidence to others without some proof of the means they possessed of acquiring exact information, and the credit to which their statements are entitled. It is in evidence before the court that false and exaggerated reports of piratical aggressions were frequently circulated, and sometimes, as the witnesses have believed, for the express purpose of drawing off the attention of the squadron from scenes in which real danger existed. It also appears that such was the character of the vessels or boats in which, at this period, the pirates sallied out from their haunts—such the facilities afforded to these marauders by the inhabitants of Cuba, and the imbecility or inactivity of the constituted authorities—such the ease with which pursuit could be evaded by retiring to the shore, that Mr. Randall has expressed a decided conviction, in the correctness of which no doubt is entertained by the court, that no naval force, however large, or however vigilant, could, of itself, ensure safety from these freebooters.

The evidence of Mr. Mountain is also in a great measure founded upon the representations of others. So far as this witness speaks of the absence for several weeks at a time of the vessels of the squadron during the summer of 1824, without giving convoy at the Havana, the allegation is not sustained either by the testimony of Mr. Randall or that of the officers at that time in the neighborhood of Cuba. The former specifies the times of the arrival and departure of the various vessels of the squadron throughout the entire summer, so far as they fell under his own observation; the latter detail the general business in which they were severally occupied; and the court has been unable to detect, in the testimony of either, the period of time to which Mr. Mountain's assertion can apply. So far as regards the alleged employment of the squadron in other objects of inferior moment, the court is desirous of separating that part of the case from that which is connected with its general operations, and to state in detail, so far as they have been given in evidence, the facts which have transpired.

It appears to the court, upon a careful review, and after a deliberate consideration of all the testimony that has been submitted to it in regard to the manner in which the squadron under the command of Commodore Porter was employed during the period of his command, that everything was done towards the suppression of piracy, which could be accomplished with a force of that description, and of such limited strength. The number of men employed was small, and the greater part of the vessels engaged qualified only for a particular kind of operations. Their inconsiderable size rendered it impracticable to carry either provisions or water for any length of time; repairs were frequently required; the stores were furnished from the United States, and the cruises, therefore, necessarily of short duration.*

It appears, also, that the confinement of the officers and men in the small schooners and barges, upon the cruises and expeditions in which they were unremittingly occupied, exposed both by day and night to the baneful influence of a noxious climate—the necessities which drove them continually to Key West for the purpose of repairing the vessels and procuring supplies, combined to engender and add virulence to the malignant diseases which broke out and proved so destructive to life, compelling, for two successive seasons, the return to the United States of a large proportion of the squadron.

Under these circumstances, it appears to the court that the officers and men have eminently entitled themselves to the commendations which they have received. Commodore Rodgers, in his report dated November 24, 1823, observes, with ample means of judging, that "the vessels particularly purchased for the suppression of piracy, have done all that could be reasonably expected towards its suppression; indeed, they have searched every nook and corner on the whole coast of Cuba from which a pirate might be expected to issue; and besides capturing and destroying all that could be identified as being of that character, they have made impressions not to be erased from the minds of such monsters, so long as we keep a respectable force in their neighborhood, in readiness to chastise those whose temerity might induce them to renew their depredations, and which, in the present state of things, notwithstanding the scourging they have received, would be the case in the absence of such a force as I have described."

Captain Finch has stated in his testimony, that when he left Matanzas, in June, 1824, in company with Commodore Porter, he did not think there was any appearance of piracy in that quarter; and that a sufficient force was left there to keep it down. "In the then state of things," he continues, "I thought that force as competent to effect the object as a larger one would have been." He also states that he recollects but a single authenticated instance of piracy while he was with the squadron. It occurred in the neighborhood of Matanzas. Lieutenant Voorhees was immediately dispatched in the Sea Gull, in pursuit of the piratical vessel, and succeeded in capturing her in the course of a few hours.

Still more recently, the Committee on Naval Affairs, at the last session of Congress, in their report to the House of Representatives on the resolution of the 9th of December, instructing them to inquire into the expediency of providing an additional naval force, and other additonal means for the suppression of piracy, state: "That they have had the subjects proposed in the said resolution under their consideration, and have made diligent inquiry into the operations of our naval force, which, for the last two years, has been employed in the Gulf of Mexico for the protection of our commerce, and the suppression of piracy. In this investigation, they feel a satisfaction in stating that the means employed have displayed the vigilance of the government, and the activity, zeal, and devotion of the officers and seamen who have been assigned to that perilous service; perilous, not from the numbers or courage of the enemy, but from the deleterious effects of a tropical climate upon natives of a more temperate region. The vessels assigned to this service, were better adapted to a short expedition, than to long and tedious cruises. They were too small to afford the room necessary to preserve the discipline and health of the officers and seamen assigned to them; yet they enabled the commander to scour the coasts, to penetrate into the shoal waters of the creeks and inlets to the very margin of the land; and, in effect, the pirates have literally been driven from the ocean, and confined to their fastnesses and haunts upon the land. Accordingly, their principal depredations for the last twelve or fifteen months have been confined to occasional sallies in boats and small craft, within one or two leagues of the shore. While these depredations have been more limited in extent and number, they have more frequently been attended with the most desperate and sanguinary destruction of the lives of the unfortunate victims."

* Letter from Com. Porter, December 21, 1822, to Purser Thornton. Letter from the Secretary of the Navy to the Naval Committee of the House of Representatives, of December 21, 1824.

Although the suppression of piracy was the principal, it was not the exclusive, object confided to Commodore Porter and the squadron under his command; nor was the attainment of that end to be accomplished singly by pursuing pirates into their haunts, and the destruction of their vessels and establishments. The general protection of the commerce of our citizens—the suppression of the slave trade, and the transportation of specie from the Gulf of Mexico to the United States, were pointed out in the original instructions from the Department, as subjects requiring special attention. Independently also of an entirely subordinate character, and temporary in their continuance, the surveys of the coasts of Florida, and of the adjacent islands and keys—the negotiation under a resolution of Congress, in regard to the establishment of buoys, lights, &c., in the vicinity of Bahama banks—the protection to be afforded to the timber on the public lands in Florida, were likewise committed to the same force. These last-mentioned objects are merely referred to, in general terms, to show the multifarious duties which this small force was instructed to perform. The others, as they continued throughout the entire period of the command of Commodore Porter, appear to require a more minute and detailed report.

In regard to the general protection of our commerce, it appears to the court that it was eminently entitled to the attention which it received; not merely from its general and obvious importance, but as one of the means of suppressing piracy. By affording convoy and adequate protection to private commerce, one of the principal inducements to piratical adventure was removed, and the probability of success in pursuing and destroying these freebooters increased, should they have the temerity to venture from their haunts. In no one particular does it appear to the court that the benefits produced by the squadron in the West India seas were more widely diffused, or greater in amount. This service, however, is one that can scarcely admit of being illustrated by reference to individual facts. It may, however, be particularly mentioned, that it is in evidence before the court, that every vessel in the squadron, in addition to her ordinary and specific duties, was engaged in affording convoy on all occasions, and in every quarter; that Lieutenant Skinner, alone, in the short period which intervened between the 30th March and the 3d July, gave convoy to about one hundred and eighty vessels. It also appears, by the report of the Secretary of the Navy, to the chairman of the Naval Committee of the House of Representatives, of December 21, 1824, that convoy was often declined, rather than submit to slight delays or changes in the course of the vessel; that insurance upon voyages to the West Indies continued unusually low, and that the offices add little, if anything, on account of the risk of piracy. On the whole, it appears to the court, that, so far as the amount and character of the force permitted, convoy was afforded to private trade in the West India seas and Gulf of Mexico, to the fullest possible extent, and to the greatest practicable advantage.

The suppression of the slave trade, also, required and received particular attention. "By direction of the Department, Commodore Porter, from time to time, dispatched one of the vessels of his squadron to the coast of Africa, to touch at Cape Messurado, minister to the wants of the agency there, and return by the usual track of the slave ships." Such practical benefit resulted from this application of the force at his disposal, that "none of these or any other of our public ships have found vessels engaged in the slave trade under the flag of the United States, and in such circumstances as to justify their being seized and sent in for adjudication."*

The next subject to which the attention of the court has been directed, is the transportation of specie, particularly from the Gulf of Mexico to the United States. From causes which have already been referred to, it has not been practicable to pursue this inquiry to the extent desired. In addition to the general instructions, already particularly referred to, orders were issued by the Department, of December 22d, 1823, by which Commodore Porter was authorized "to receive on board specie, and the articles permitted by the act for the better government of the navy, belonging exclusively to our citizens, and to carry them from one port or place to another, when it does not, in any degree, conflict with your other duties, or violate the laws of the country where you are. You may also bring to the United States specie belonging to our own citizens, but you are, in no case, to permit anything in the shape or character of public advertisements to be used for the purpose of giving information that you will carry it." "And, that the government may know the extent to which the commercial interests of our citizens are benefited by the assistance afforded by our public vessels on this point, and be prepared to answer any complaints on the subject which may be made by individuals or governments, you will, from time to time, make reports to this Department of all the specie and other articles you may carry, the places to and from which you carry them, and the circumstances, terms and conditions on which you do it."

On the 20th July, 1824, the Secretary of the Navy again expresses to Commodore Porter, that "it is the wish of the Department that you cause a portion of the force under your command to touch occasionally at the port of Tampico, in Mexico, and to afford protection to the citizens of the United States engaged in commerce with that port."

In obedience to the general instructions, the Shark, under the command of Lieutenant M. C. Perry, was dispatched in March, 1823, to the Gulf of Mexico.† On the 14th May the Peacock sailed from Thompson's Island to relieve him,‡ and thus at intervals of from six weeks to three months, a vessel was sent in that quarter, preparatory to her return to the United States.

* Report of Secretary of Navy, Dec. 1, 1824. † Orders of that date. ‡ Orders of May 7th.

After the receipt of the instructions of December 22d, 1823, a circular letter was addressed on the 30th of the same month, to the different commanders under his orders, forbidding them to take on freight any treasure, without special instructions to that purpose. On the 16th October, 1824, Commodore Porter reported to the Department the amount of specie which had at that time been transported by the different vessels under his command, since the preceding December. From this statement it appears that specie to the amount of $399,000 had been carried within that period, at the average freight of $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. One other vessel under his command, which appears to have carried specie, the Shark, commanded by Lieutenant Gallagher, is not included in this report, not having at its date arrived at the port of destination.* So far as the court has been able to ascertain the facts, it is inclined to believe that the amount of specie carried on freight, in the preceding year, did not equal in amount that which is stated in the report of Commodore Porter, as carried in 1824.

The orders under which Lieutenant Stevens acted, appear to have been given by the Department, on the application of the Bank of the United States, and, consequently, this appears to the court to have been a special employment of that officer and the vessel under his command by the government for public purposes.

The general character of the instructions given by Commodore Porter, in the year 1824, to the commanders of vessels bound to the Gulf of Mexico, may be ascertained from those annexed to the record, given to Captain Dallas, Lieutenant Stevens and Lieutenant Skinner.

After a deliberate and full consideration of all the facts that have been elicited upon this subject, in the progress of this investigation, it appears to the court to be abundantly proved by the testimony:

1. That the instructions given by Commodore Porter to his various officers, were strictly in accordance with those received by him from the Department, in relation to the transportation of specie; and in no instance did they transcend the provisions of the 23d article of the rules and regulations for the better government of the navy.

2. That the transportation of specie was in itself an object of sufficient moment, both to the government and the commercial interests of the country, to warrant the employment of the vessels of the squadron as frequently as they were sent to the Gulf of Mexico.

3. That the general protection of commerce, and the suppression of piracy, required the presence of an American armed vessel in the Gulf of Mexico, as frequently as one was dispatched there, and at the places to which it was sent, entirely independent of any special view to the transportation of specie.

4. That in no one instance was the transportation of specie made anything more than wholly subordinate, and ancillary to the general objects for which the squadron was employed. That in many instances detailed in the testimony, various officers declined to receive specie on board, when it might have been obtained, in consequence of their extreme anxiety to obey the orders which they had received, not to permit this subject to intefere, in any degree, with the general objects of their cruise.

5. The court has not been able to discover a single instance in which any vessel, on board which Commodore Porter was at any time, under any circumstances, received any specie to be carried on freight.

6. That the proportion of the freight paid over to him as the commander-in-chief, was paid as the voluntary and spontaneous act of the different officers, who carried the specie, without any provision by law, or any demand by Commodore Porter himself, but simply in conformity with general custom.

The court has thus, in obedience to the orders of the Department, gone through the investigation which it has been required to make. The result of this laborious inquiry has already been stated in detail. In concluding this report, it may be sufficient to add, that the manner in which the squadron, under the command of Captain Porter, was employed, during the period of his command, appears to the court to have been highly honorable to him, and to the officers and men employed—that the said forces were employed in the suppression of piracy, in the most effective manner in which they could be employed, in conformity with the orders and instructions from the Department, and that no part of them was on any occasion engaged in objects of inferior moment, to the injury of the public service.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

I. CHAUNCEY, President.

RICHARD S. COXE, Judge Advocate, May 23, 1825.

PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Extract from the President's message to both Houses of Congress, at the commencement of the second session of the seventeenth Congress, dated December 3d, 1822.

A report from the Secretary of the Navy will communicate the progress which has been made in the construction of vessels of war, with other interesting details respecting the actual state of the affairs of that Department. It has been found necessary for the protection of our commerce, to maintain the usual squadrons on the Mediterranean, the Pacific, and along the Atlantic coast, extending the cruises of the latter into the West Indies, where piracy, organized into a system, has preyed on the commerce of every country trading thither. A cruise has also been maintained on the coast of Africa, when the season would permit, for the suppression of the slave trade; and orders have been given to the commanders of all our public ships, to seize our own vessels, should they find any engaged in that trade, and to bring them in for adjudication.

In the West Indies, piracy is of recent date, which may explain the cause why other powers have not combined against it. By the documents communicated, it will be seen that the efforts of the United States to suppress it, have had a very salutary effect. The benevolent provision of the act, under which the protection has been extended alike to the commerce of other nations, cannot fail to be duly appreciated by them.

Recent information of the multiplied outrages and depredations which have been committed on our seamen and commerce by the pirates in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico, exemplified by the death of a very meritorious officer, seems to call for some prompt and decisive measures on the part of the government. All the public vessels adapted to that service, which can be spared from other indispensable duties, are already employed in it: but, from the knowledge which has been acquired of the places from whence outlaws issue, and to which they escape from danger, it appears that it will require a particular kind of force, capable of pursuing them into the shallow waters to which they retire, effectually to suppress them. I submit to the consideration of Congress the propriety of organizing such a force for that important object.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, September 21, 1823.

President Monroe:

SIR: I feel it to be my duty to represent to you the following facts, and to request the favor of your opinion respecting the course proposed.

On the 17th of this month, by the arrival of the Beagle, at this place, from Thompson's Island, the Department was furnished with reports from the commanding officer, and the surgeons at that station, up to the first of September, by which we learn that the John Adams, and several smaller vessels, were at that place; that, about the 20th of August, the yellow fever made its appearance, with considerable malignity; that several deaths had occurred, among which were two lieutenants, Potter and Somerville; two midshipmen, Marshall and Reed; the captain's clerk, Thomas; a carpenter, two seamen, a gunner, a cooper, and a steward; that Commodore Porter and twenty-one officers and men, were sick; the commodore in a state of great debility, but good hopes were entertained of his recovery. By the arrival of Lieutenant Boarman, yesterday morning, we have verbal information to the 8th of September, when Commodore Porter remained much as he was on the 1st; between the 1st and the 8th, there had been several deaths, and among them two lieutenants and two midshipmen; and the fever did not in any degree abate. All the surgeons were sick, and four surgeons' mates constitute the whole medical skill at the station.

A careful examination of the reports of the sick, and minute inquiries of several officers who have been there, do not satisfy me that the fever originated on the island; but I incline to the opinion, that the infection may, in every instance, be traced to other places; but, whether it originated there, or be imported, the destruction of valuable lives is equally to be lamented, and the effects upon the service equally demand attention. Accounts from that place, some of them very exaggerated, find their way to the public prints, and create painful anxiety with the friends of those who are there, and will, it is to be feared, unless promptly corrected, produce feelings in the nation, which will be essentially injurious to our important interests in that quarter.

The value of that station for the suppression of piracy, and the protection of commerce, is perfectly understood by you. It ought not readily to be deserted. It is very desirable to save it, while we take the most effectual means to protect the valuable lives of our officers and men. It is impossible to leave them there, especially, situated as the commanding officer is, without taking some decisive measure for their relief; and, to order their immediate removal, with our present information, would seem hazardous and improper.

Two or three surgeons and surgeons' mates have been ordered, and are on their way to the island. And, in order to obtain the best advice in my power, I have submitted to Dr. Cutbush, and four other surgeons, now in the city, all the information which I could procure; stated to them the time within which an order for removal could be executed, and required their opinion on the propriety of attempting a removal of the vessels to some northern port. Their report will be made to me at eight o'clock to-morrow morning, and I shall, probably, send you a copy. Their opinion must, necessarily, be less safe than if formed on the spot; but it may be a useful aid in determining on the course to be pursued.

The plan which I propose for your consideration, and which I shall adopt, if you do not disapprove it, is the following:

Prepare the Shark, now at New York, to sail to Thompson's Island, as speedily as possible; send in her one of the oldest and most experienced officers in the navy, with three of the most skillful and intelligent surgeons; direct them, in connection with Commodore Porter, (if his health will permit,) to investigate thoroughly the origin, causes, and progress of the disease; the nature and situation of the island in reference to health, at this season of the year; the present state and probable health of the station; with authority either to retain the vessels there, or, if necessary, remove them to a northern port, until the advance of winter shall justify their return to that latitude.

The Shark can sail in less than ten days; will probably take ten more to reach the island; and a removal may be effected in five more, if it be found necessary; I presume the officers who go out, may return in about four weeks from the time the vessel sails.

I believe I should select Commodore Rodgers for this purpose and have consulted him about it. He approves the plan, and with his usual promptness in the public service, expressed a wish to partake in its execution.

The following benefits would result:

1st. The best medical assistance will, in this way, be furnished to the sick, at that station, and many valuable lives may be saved.

2d. The public mind will be quieted by a precise knowledge of facts.

3d. A station, necessary to the objects for which the government sent out the expedition, will probably be continued and secured.

4th. We shall obtain the safest information to guide us on all future occasions.

I shall be pleased if this plan meet your approbation, and shall make the necessary arrangements for it, not, however, giving any orders which will create difficulty, should you disapprove it. Please to favor me with an answer by the express.

I am, sir, very respectfully, &c., SAM'L L. SOUTHARD.

The Secretary of the Navy to Commodore Rodgers.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, September 29, 1823.

DEAR SIR: I enclose your orders. You are already well acquainted with the views of the Department, and of the President, in relation to your visit to Thompson's Island, and the motives by which it has been induced.

On your arrival there, you will, of course, communicate freely with Commodore Porter respecting them, should he still be there, and in a situation to receive your communications. The uncertainty whether he be still living; the anxiety felt by the government and nation for his safety; the numerous reports of the sickly state of the officers and crews of the vessels, and of those who are on the island; and the desire to furnish the most prompt and effectual relief; are among the principal causes which have created the wish that you should undertake the expedition. In its faithful execution, and beneficial results, I have strong confidence; and am, dear sir, very respectfully, yours,

SAM'L L. SOUTHARD.

JOHN RODGERS, Esq., Capt. U. S. Navy, President Naval Board.

The Secretary of the Navy to Commodore Rodgers.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, September 29, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed in the schooner Shark, from New York, to Thompson's Island, as speedily as circumstances will permit, taking with you Surgeons Marshall, Heerman, Harris, and Washington, who will obey your orders, and render all the assistance in their power in accomplishing the objects of your expedition. If either of them is prevented from joining you before you sail, you will require the attendance of Surgeon Hoffman, or any other of the surgeons, at New York, to supply his place.

If any officers be wanting to make up the complement of the Shark, you will select such as are necessary, at New York. When you shall arrive at Thompson's Island, you will investigate, with the utmost care, the origin, progress, and present state of the sickness, which prevails on the island, and in the squadron; the condition of all the vessels which are there; the localities of the station, in reference to health, and every matter which may be necessary and proper, to enable you to form a correct opinion, both of the propriety of continuing the vessels at that station, and of using it hereafter during the sickly season.

After having made the necessary inquiries, you will either take such measures as shall seem proper, in reference to the health and comfort of the squadron, leaving it where it is; or you will order it removed, for the present, to Pensacola, Norfolk, or some more northern port. In either event, an early and minute report on this subject, to this Department, is desirable.

Uncertainty as to the present state of Commodore Porter's health, furnishes one strong motive for your visit. If his health permits, he will furnish the most safe information and best assistance in accomplishing your object; and if the squadron be left there he will remain in command, if his health permit, and if it be his wish. If his health require a visit to the United States, you will place some other in command, and make report thereof as soon as practicable.

The surgeons who go with you will render to the sick all the aid in their power, consistently with the other duties they have to perform; and they will return with you, and join the several stations from which they are taken, reporting to this Department the time of their arrival.

You will be at liberty to return in the Shark, Grampus or any other vessel at the station, which you shall think best for the service. It is supposed you may accomplish the objects in view, and return to this place, in about five weeks from the time the Shark sails.

I am, very, respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

SAM'L L. SOUTHARD.

JOHN RODGERS, Esq., Captain U. S. Navy, President of the Navy Board.

Commodore Rodgers to the Secretary of the Navy.

No. 1.

UNITED STATES SCHOONER SHARK, Hampton Roads, November 16, 1823.

SIR: In the prosecution of your instructions of the 29th of September last, you have already been informed of the time of my departure from New York, in the United States schooner Shark.

I have now the honor to inform you, that on the 23d of October, I reached Thompson's Island, accompanied by Surgeons Harris, Washington, and Hoffman, of the navy, after a passage of seventeen days, in which we experienced much rough, disagreeable weather, it raining more or less every day but one, for thirteen days.

On reaching the island, and not finding any of the public vessels of war except the Porpoise, the first objects to which I directed my attention were, to ascertain the state and condition of the sick remaining on it; and, as far as practicable, the cause or causes which had produced such disastrous consequences to the health of the officers, seamen, and marines, stationed on the island, and on board of several of the vessels, which had previously had access to it as a rendezvous. For this purpose, I accordingly addressed a letter (of which the enclosed No. 1 is a copy) to Surgeons Harris, Washington, and Hoffman. By their answer, (No 2, herewith enclosed,) you will perceive that they do not consider the disease attributable entirely to any one cause, but to a variety of causes, such as they have described.

That the reasons which they have assigned are correct, there can be but little doubt; but to which of them is to be attributed the most powerful agency in producing the disease, is still a matter of speculation, or, at least, very questionable.

The island, it must be admitted, does contain localities of a character calculated, when assisted by other causes, and perhaps only slight ones too, to generate bilious, and probably malignant fevers; yet I must confess, that I still entertain doubts, whether those causes have had, in the present instance, so decisive an agency in producing the late fatal malady, as they may, at first view, seem to have had.

From the little experience I have had, my opinion is, that the climate of Thompson's Island is similiar to the West India islands generally; that its air is perhaps less salubrious than some, but more so than others; and that, notwithstanding the objections which may be urged against it, on account of particular defects, arising from its small elevation above the level of the sea, the unevenness of its surface, and the many salt and fresh water ponds which it is said to contain; still, that it is, from the excellence of its harbor, and its peculiar station on the map of this western hemisphere, too important an object, in a political and commercial point of view, to be suffered to remain unoccupied and unregarded; for, admitting its climate, in its present unimproved state, to be as unfriendly to health as even that of the colony of Surinam, it is, notwithstanding, susceptible of being so improved, or, at least, the dangers attending it so much diminished, by artificial means, (such as I will hereafter describe,) as to render the objections to it, if not harmless, at least comparatively small.

Previous to leaving the island on the third inst., I had sent, by the advice of Surgeons Harris, Washington, Hoffman and Williamson, (as I have already informed you,) all the sick, whose situations appeared to require a removal, to a more northern climate. Those who still remained on the island, at the time of my departure, were all well, except some convalescents, and a few with mild intermittent fevers; all of whom, it was believed, however, would be restored to health again by the return of cooler weather; indeed, for the last three days previous to our sailing, the wind had prevailed with much force from the north, and had rendered the air comparatively much purer, cooler, and exhilirating, than it had been for some days before, so much so as to induce a belief that the season of health had commenced, and that its salutary effects would be immediately felt by those who have suffered by the long continuance of heat.

Previous to leaving the island, I made such arrangements, and saw things placed upon such a footing, as to warrant the most sanguine anticipation of favorable results, and such as might have been expected, had Commodore Porter's health permitted him to continue on the station.

For the few changes which I found it necessary to make in the disposition of the several vessels left on the station, permit me to refer you to the accompanying papers 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN RODGERS.

The Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

Doctors Harris, Washington, and Hoffman, to the Secretary of the Navy.

No. 2.

U. S. SCHOONER SHARK, Thompson's Island, October 29, 1813.

SIR: In conformity with the instructions contained in your communication of the twenty-fourth inst., we have carefully inquired into, and deliberately considered, the various points to which you have directed our attention.

On examining this island, we find that it is of a secondary calcareous formation, and is thinly overspread with a light vegetable mould. The shores are somewhat elevated above the interior grounds by the surf continually throwing up pulverized shells, which give a concave form to its superfices. It is thickly covered with small trees and shrubbery, principally of the mangrove variety, and grasses of several species grow with great luxuriance.

So far as our observations have enabled us to determine, we are of opinion that nearly one-half of the island is occupied by salt and fresh water ponds.

It has been ascertained that the surfaces of these ponds are on a level with the surrounding ocean, yet but one of them has any connection with it, by reason of the natural embankments to which we have already alluded.

The purest water of the island is in some degree brackish, but has not, so far as we can learn, produced any unfriendly effect on the health of those who have used it freely as a drink.

During the dry season, which continues from about the middle of September to the middle of June, many of the ponds either dry up, or shrink considerably within the boundaries to which they are dilated during the rainy season.

The surface being thus imperfectly overflowed, presents a mass of vegetable and animal matter, to which the climate adds every other circumstance necessary to give miasm its most powerful effect on the human frame. The gales and retiring tides frequently deposit on the shores a quantity of sea-weed, which undergoes a rapid decomposition, and thus contributes, in a limited extent, to vitiate the atmosphere.

To these miasmatic causes of disease, were added others of equal, if not greater magnitude.

They have arisen:

1. From the sudden exposure of northern constitutions to a tropical climate, at a period when the ordinary relaxing effects of a change from a cold to a warm season were aggravated by a difference of fourteen or fifteen degrees of southern latitude. From this cause, they were, in the space of two or three weeks, operated upon by an increase of temperature of at least fifty degrees.

2. From the great fatigue and exposure, by day and night, of the officers and crews engaged in the boat service, and from the want of comfortable quarters for those who had encamped on the island.

3. From irregular, and, frequently, intemperate habits.

4. From being often deprived of fresh and wholesome provisions.

5. From the continued annoyance of mosquitoes and sand-flies, which deprived the men of their accustomed rest. So insupportable, indeed, became these troublesome insects, that the men were frequently obliged to retire to the beach, where they walked the greater part of the night. Others, we have been informed by the officers of the station, would row off in boats some distance from the shore, and thus expose themselves either to the heavy dews or drenching rains peculiar to this climate.

6. From being operated upon by the depressing passions arising from apprehension, awakened by the prevailing epidemic, and by the obvious want of comfort of those who were affected with disease.

These fruitful sources of fever will abundantly account for their extent and fatality. Taking into consideration the great liability of persons from the higher latitudes, to disease, when even slightly exposed to hardships in the tropics, it ought not to be a subject of surprise that the severely arduous service in which our officers and crews have been engaged, have occasioned so many sacrifices of valuable lives.

The squadron under the command of Commodore Porter sailed from Nolfolk on the 14th of February, proceeded directly to the West Indies, as far south as St. Domingo, and then, returning north, took possession of this island on the 3d of April.

The first cases of fever which presented themselves to the notice of Dr. Williamson, the surgeon of the station, were of a bilious character, and which readily yielded to the agency of medicines.

On the 20th of April, a servant in the family of Mr. Symington, was attacked with yellow fever. With the exception of this case, bilious fever continued the prevalent disease until early in June, when it assumed, in many instances, a highly malignant form. This disease now commenced on board the store ship Decoy, which was rendered unhealthful by the impurity of her hold. A quantity of ballast was put aboard from this island, containing shell-fish and sea-weed, which, by the heat of a tropical climate, was thrown into a state of putrefactive fermentation. Two of the cases, however, which occurred on board this vessel, were contracted by imprudent exposure to a noon-day heat in the streets of Havana.

About the latter end of July the yellow fever prevailed, with great malignancy, at all the establishments on the island. From the various causes already stated, the disease, in very many instances, necessarily proved fatal.

The malignant fever continued epidemic until about the first of October, when its type again changed to an intermittent.

We have been unable to ascertain the precise number of deaths, in consequence of the absence of the medical officers who had charge of the Allenton hospital.

It appears from the report of Dr. Williamson, that there are fifty-nine persons now sick at the different hospitals on the island. We have visited these establishments, and have found the patients sinking under the influence of debility, despondency, and the ravages of disease. Such of them as recover, commonly relapse in the course of a day or two, after being restored to duty. As in relapses generally, each succeeding attack becomes more unmanageable.

It appears, then, that they cannot be restored to perfect health in their present situation; and being, in this state, only a burden to the public service, we do, from motives of policy, as well as of humanity, respectfully recommend their immediate removal to a more northern station.

We beg further to recommend, that the large brig, now in the harbor, and which has been already designated as a hospital, should be suitably fitted up for the reception of those who may be hereafter attacked. By anchoring this vessel some distance to the windward of the island, the sick will inhale a pure atmosphere, will be protected in comfortable quarters, and, being without the reach of annoying insects, will enjoy such repose and tranquillity, as are essential to the successful treatment of their diseases.

We have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servants,

Com. JOHN RODGERS, President of the Board of Navy Commissioners.

Commodore Rodgers to the Secretary of the Navy.

WASHINGTON, November 24, 1823.

SIR: In my communication to you of the 10th instant, I informed you that although objections might be urged to the climate of Thompson's Island, on account of the number of salt and fresh water ponds, and the abundant growth of timber which it contains, yet, even in its present state, and admitting such objections to be well founded, still they might be rendered harmless, or, at any rate, greatly diminished, by the introduction of artificial means.

By the official report of Surgeons Harris, Washington and Hoffman, now in your possession, you have been made acquainted with their opinions respecting the localities of the island, so far as regards the form of its surface, the nature of its soil, timber, and other particulars; in all which, they have given as minute a description as the most unremitting attention, considering the length of time they were there, and the means of information afforded them, would admit.

These, together with the high reputation which those gentlemen sustain for science and professional skill, leave no doubt in my mind that their report upon the subject has been judicious, and such as the time and circumstances under which they visited the island, would seem to point out as being the most safe and discreet; but, after all that has been said, it must be admitted, notwithstanding their unintermitting industry to find out the true causes of the disease, that they were, after considering the only facts presented to their view, obliged to attribute it to a variety of causes, and, among the number, those which are known to be inseparable from the arduous nature of the service in which many of the officers and men were engaged, and the consequent exposure to which they were unavoidably subjected.

This being the case, you will, sir, at once perceive that it must still remain doubtful, whether the air of the island contributed more, or even as much as other causes, in producing the disease; for which reason I am led to remark, that it might be unsafe to condemn it as an unsuitable rendezvous for our vessels employed in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico, until we shall have had, under different circumstances, more experience of its climate than we have yet had.

As an auxiliary to an extensive and permanent southern naval depot, (perhaps at Pensacola,) such as a proper security for our commerce, and the permanent union of the States, seem to render indispensable, it will be found, I am inclined to believe, that the island in question will soon become an object worthy the serious attention and consideration of the government.

Nature has made it the advance post from which to watch and guard our commerce passing to and from the Mississippi, while, at the same time, its peculiar situation and the excellence of its harbor point it out as the most certain key to the commerce of the Havana, to that of the whole Gulf of Mexico, and to the returning trade of Jamaica; and I venture to predict that the first important naval contest in which this country shall be engaged will be in the neighborhood of this very island.

Without further remark on this interesting subject, permit me, sir, to observe that, whatever objections may be made to the island as a rendezvous, in its present unimproved and uncultivated state, even these may be rendered harmless, or at least measurably unimportant, by substituting the following description of force for that now employed in the protection of our commerce in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico:

The Independence 74, depriving her of her lower deck guns, and giving her a crew of four hundred and fifty seamen, ordinary seamen, boys, and marines, with an extra complement of commission officers, and double the usual number of midshipmen; the sloops-of-war John Adams, Hornet, and such other vessel of that class as can, from time to time, be spared from other service; the brig Spark, and schooners Grampus, Porpoise, and Wild Cat, and five or six barges, such as are now at Thompson's Island, for occasional service.

The vessels particularly purchased for the suppression of piracy have done all that could reasonably have been expected towards its suppression; indeed, they have searched every nook and corner on the whole coast of Cuba from which a pirate might be expected to issue; and, besides capturing and destroying all that could be identified as being of this character, they have made impressions not to be erased from the minds of such monsters, so long as we keep a respectable force in their neighborhood in readiness to chastise those whose temerity might induce them to renew their depredations, and which, in the present state of things, notwithstanding the scourging they have received, would be the case in the absence of such a force as I have described.

On the adoption of the before-mentioned force, the other vessels purchased for the suppression of piracy might be sold; a circumstance very much to be desired, as their longer employment would be found not only useless, and dangerous to the health and comfort of those employed in them, but subversive of that discipline by which our navy acquired its character, and for which, at one time, it may be said to have stood unrivaled by any other.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

JOHN RODGERS.

To the Hon. Sam'l L. Southard, Secretary of the Navy.

Report of the Secretary of the Navy.

Navy Department, December 1, 1823.

The President of the United States:

Sir: In obedience to the request contained in your letter of the 10th ultimo, I submit, respectfully, the following statement of the administration of this Department, during the present year, comprehending the number of vessels commissioned; the number in ordinary, fit for service, or requiring repairs; the progress made in building vessels; with the disbursements of the Department, and the service in which the vessels have been employed; with such observations on the whole subject as are deemed proper.

Letter 1, from the Commissioners of the Navy, with papers A, B, C, D, and E, which accompany it, exhibit:

1. The vessels-of-war in commission, with the service in which they are employed. See A.

2. The vessels in ordinary, on the Atlantic board and on the lakes, with the state of repairs of each vessel.—B and C.

3. The progress made in building, under the law "to increase the navy of the United States."—D. By this it appears that four ships of the line have heretofore been built, and that five ships of the line and five frigates of the first class are now building; some of which might be launched in thirty days; and all, except one, in one hundred and twenty days.

4. A general view of the improvements of the several building yards. In some of the yards additional improvements are now necessary for their comfortable and economical administration.

5. The disbursements of the Department during the three first quarters of the present year, up to the 30th September. (2.) The disbursements of the year 1822 appear by the report made to Congress in the month of February last. It appears that $1,984,520.74 have been drawn from the treasury between the 1st January and 30th September, leaving on the latter day $2,218,168.66 unexpended of the amount applicable to the service of the year. Of this unexpended balance, a large proportion will be used during the remaining quarter; and a minute statement of the whole will be furnished to Congress in the annual report required from this Department.

On paper A, it is to be remarked, that the frigate Constitution, sloop-of-war Ontario, and schooner Nonsuch, are in the Mediterranean, under the command of Captain Jones. No change in the amount of force, in that sea, has been made within the year. It has been found competent to all the purposes for which it is maintained. Our commerce there has been amply protected; the officers and seamen have enjoyed good health, and no circumstance has occurred worthy of particular notice. While our relations with other powers continue friendly, any large augmentation of that portion of our naval force will not be necessary. In the coming year it is not proposed materially to increase or diminish it. The Cyane and Erie will, in a short time, relieve the Constitution and Ontario, that they may return home, discharge their crews, whose term of service will soon expire, refit, and resume their station. For this purpose the Erie, Captain Deacon, sailed from New York on the 8th November, and the Cyane, Captain Creighton, will sail in a few days.

On the same paper, A, it is to be further remarked, that the Franklin, ship of the line, and the schooner Dolphin, of 12 guns, are still in the Pacific ocean, where they have remained for more than two years, under the command of Captain Stewart. By the presence of this force on the coasts of Chili and Peru, depredations on our growing commerce have been, in a great degree, prevented, and respect for our interests and flag secured.

Capt. Stewart will return to the United States in the course of this winter, or early in the ensuing spring; and, in the place of the Franklin, it is proposed to substitute the frigate United States, and the Peacock, sloop-of-war, of 18 guns. Such a division of the force, it is believed, will more extensively protect the flag and commerce of the United States, and permit the commanding officer, with the larger vessel, to be absent from the usual cruising grounds for a short time, should circumstances render such absence necessary. Captain Hull will sail, in a few days, from Norfolk, in command of these vessels.

The Cyane, Captain Spence, and the Shark, commanded by Lieut. M. C. Perry, have, for short periods, cruised upon the coast of Africa, to carry into effect the intentions of the government, in the suppression of the slave trade, and the protection of the agency for liberated Africans, established at Cape Messurado.

While Captain Spencer was at Sierra Leone and the Cape, he fitted out the Augusta, a small schooner, which was found on the coast, deserted and dismantled, and placed under the command of Lieut Dashiell, to cruise in the neighborhood of the Cape, with the conviction that its presence was at that time essential to the protection of the agency, and might be useful in preventing the traffic in slaves. It still remains upon that coast.

During the time that Captain Spence and Lieutenant Perry were cruising, they neither saw nor heard of any vessel, under the American flag, engaged in the slave trade. If citizens of the United States are still employed in that traffic, they seem to have been driven to conceal themselves under the flags of other nations.

The agency at Cape Messurado, for receiving recaptured and liberated Africans, enjoyed favorable prospects, until late last fall, when it was assailed by a large body of the natives, and in danger of being entirely destroyed. Some of the liberated Africans were killed in the contest. The extracts of letters from Captain Spence, Lieutenant Perry, and Messrs. Ashmun and Ayres, will show the manner in which they were able to defend themselves, with the aid of a midshipman and several men belonging to a British vessel of war, then in the neighborhood. The establishment having passed through this trial, now promises to accomplish all the benefits anticipated from it. In order to afford it the necessary protection, and continue our exertions to repress the slave trade, it is proposed, as the most efficient and economical arrangement, that the commander of the West India squadron shall, from time to time, detach one or more of the vessels belonging to his command, to cruise along the African coast, occasionally touching at Cape Messurado, and ministering to the wants of the people there; and following, in their return, the usual track of the slave ships.

Eleven Africans, none of whom could speak the English language, were, some months ago, brought by a Capt. Chase, as mariners, into the port of Baltimore, and were there taken into the possession of the officers of the government, and an investigation instituted into the supposed violation of our laws in introducing them. By means of an interpreter, who understood the languages of all, except one or two of them, it was subsequently discovered, that they belonged to tribes in the neighborhood of Messurado, and that some of them were of the head men of their tribes. It was therefore believed that their restoration by this government would produce a salutary effect; and an inquiry was directed to be made through the interpreter, whether they were willing to return to Africa. Such being found to be their wish, they were, in the early part of October, sent to our agent at Messurado, with directions to permit their return to their several homes, by the best and most expeditious means.

So far as the Department is yet apprised of the expenditures for the agency during the present year, they have amounted to $7,287.48 cents.

On the western side of the Atlantic ocean, and in the Gulf of Mexico, the operations of our naval force have been more active. Several vessels were in commission there, at the close of the last year. To these were added, under the authority of the law passed at the last session of Congress, "authorizing an additional naval force for the suppression of piracy," the steam galliot Sea Gull; eight small schooners, the Grayhound, Jackall, Fox, Wild Cat, Beagle, Ferret, Weasel, and Terrier; five barges, the Musquito, Gnat, Midge, Sandfly, and Gallinipper; and one transport ship, the Decoy.

Capt. David Porter was appointed to the command of the squadron, and sailed from Norfolk about the 10th of February last. His station was at Thompson's Island, from which he dispatched his vessels, in such way as he judged best suited to attain his objects. The annexed extracts from his letters and reports exhibit the results.

The size of most of the vessels, the nature of the duties, and the exposure of the officers and men, called for a display of perseverance and fortitude seldom required of those engaged in our service; but the call was well answered. Everything was accomplished which was anticipated from the expedition. Piracy, as a system, has been repressed in the neigborhood of the Island of Cuba, and now requires only to be watched by a proper force to be prevented from afflicting commerce any further in that quarter. The public authorities of the Island of Cuba manifested a friendly disposition towards the squadron, and rendered much assistance in the pursuit of its objects.

On the 5th March, as Lieutenant Cocke, in obedience to the orders of Captain Porter, was entering the harbor of St. Johns, Porto Rico, in the schooner Fox, he was killed by a shot from the castle. Extracts from the correspondence between Captain Porter and the governor of the island, are annexed.

The squadron was healthy and prosperous until about the middle of August, when a malignant fever broke out at the station, and destroyed many valuable lives. The first reports of this calamity were brought to the Department on the 17th September. At the time they left the island, Captain Porter and most of the medical officers were sick, and there was great cause to fear that the squadron would be deprived of its commanding officer, and of the medical assistance necessary to its safety. Under these circumstances it was considered expedient to send to the station an officer of rank and experience, with a sufficient number of surgeons, to furnish, in any event, the aid necessary for the safety and proper conduct of the squadron, with power to remove it, should that be found necessary. Captain Rodgers cheerfully consented to encounter the hazard and responsibility attendant on such an expedition. He sailed from New York as soon as such a vessel could be prepared for the purpose; but, before his arrival, Captain Porter had become convalescent, and, with the greater part of the squadron, had returned to the United States. The report of these officers will fully explain their views of the causes of the disease, and the means by which a recurrence of it may be prevented.

It is believed that the Florida station is incalculably important to some of the best interests of this Union; and that it ought not to be deserted until every expedient has failed to render it a secure and healthy position for our vessels. I feel great confidence in the opinion that it may be made such, without encountering great hazard of the evils we have heretofore suffered.

For the protection of commerce, and the suppression of piracy in the western Atlantic and Gulf of Mexico, it is proposed, in the ensuing year, to continue Thompson's Island as the station for the vessels employed in those objects; to place there a ship of the line, armed and manned as a frigate, for which purpose the Independence is well fitted; and to attach to the command the John Adams and Hornet, and one other sloop-of-war, with four of the larger schooners, the Grampus, Porpoise, Shark, and Spark, one of the smaller schooners, and the barges. This force is competent to protect all our interests. The ship of the line, placed in a proper position, will afford comfortable accommodations to those who are obliged to remain at the station, and prevent the necessity of intercourse with the island, when danger is suspected. The cruises of the other vessels, except those which visit the coast of Africa, may be limited to four, five, or six weeks, and, on their return, their crews may be exchanged for others, who, during that time, have been stationary. By these means, and a proper attention to cleanliness, both in the men and the vessels, and avoiding intercourse with places known to be sickly, the health of all will probably be preserved. For the proper execution of such a system, full reliance may be placed in our officers. The island itself, by clearing, draining, and cultivating, will, after a time, probably become more healthful.

It will be perceived that this distribution of force includes only one of the small schooners. They were admirably calculated for the end for which they were purchased, and have effected it. But piracy being for the present repressed, and requiring such a force only as will prevent its revival, they are no longer necessary; and, being both very expensive and utterly subversive of all discipline, it is respectfully recommended that they be sold, retaining one for the present season; after which it may be sold. The Porpoise and a small schooner have been employed under the command of Lieutenant Ramage, in the survey of a part of the Florida coast. It is proposed that those vessels be placed under the control of the commanding officer of the Florida station; and, if it be found proper to continue the survey, that the instructions for that purpose be given to that officer.

Many of the officers having died during the present year, it is thought proper to annex a list of the times and places of their deaths.

No observations on the organization and discipline of the navy seem to be required. That subject has heretofore been presented for consideration.

Very respectfully, I have the honor to be, your most obedient servant,

SAM'L L. SOUTHARD.

The Secretary of the Navy to the President of the United States.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, December 1, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to present to you the following report, exhibiting the administration of this Department during the present year.

There are now in commission for the sea service, the vessels named in paper A, subjoined to this report.

Nothing, worthy of particular observation, has occurred with our squadron in the Mediterranean.

It has been maintained at the extent which was proposed in the report of last year, and has afforded the necessary protection to our commerce there. The unfriendly relations, however, which exist between Algiers and some of the governments of Europe, and the effects not unlikely to be felt, upon our political and commercial interests in that quarter, with other important considerations, have been supposed to render it expedient to augment our force. With this view, the North Carolina has been prepared, and will sail in a few days. The squadron will then consist of the ship of the line North Carolina, frigate Constitution, corvette Cyane, the sloops-of-war Erie and Ontario, and schooner Nonsuch; and will be under the command of Commodore Rodgers, who has been, for several years past, the president of the Board of Navy Commissioners, and whose high qualifications are so well known and justly estimated by the nation.

Our naval force in the Atlantic and Gulf of Mexico, has continued under the command of Commodore Porter. By directions of the Department, he has, from time to time, dispatched one of the vessels of his squadron to the coast of Africa, to touch at Cape Messurado, minister to the wants of the agency there, and return by the usual track of the slave ships. None of these, or any other of our public ships have found vessels engaged in the slave trade, under the flag of the United States, and in such circumstances as to justify their being seized and sent in for adjudication. And, although it is known that the trade still exists, to a most lamentable extent, yet, as it is seldom, if ever, carried on under our own flag, it is impossible, with the existing regulations and instructions, to afford very efficient aid in exterminating it. That object can only be accomplished by the combined effort of the maritime nations, each yielding to the others the facilities necessary to detect the traffic under its own flag. The agency for recaptured Africans has been maintained, in the same manner as in the last year. The eleven negroes which were taken from Captain Chase, at Baltimore, and sent to the agency, were restored to their homes, under circumstances very gratifying to humanity, and calculated to produce a good effect upon their several tribes. The near relations of some of them were on the shore when they arrived, manifested much sensibility at their unexpected return, and furnished safe means of restoring them to their families.

The agent, Dr. Ayres, was compelled, by enfeebled health, to return to the United States, and left Mr. Ashmun as acting agent. He likewise was obliged, by the same cause, to be absent for a time; inconveniences necessarily resulted, and it was thought expedient to send the Rev. Mr. Gurley to examine into the situation of the agency, with directions to make certain arrangements, should circumstances require them. His report, marked B, with other papers, will be annexed, should his health enable him to make it in time, and will show the condition and prospects of the agency. The principal difficulties which have been encountered there, have arisen from the want of a fit position and suitable accommodations for the agent, and the recaptured Africans, on their arrival on the coast. These difficulties have been, in a great degree, overcome, and will, with the expense, be regularly diminished, as the establishment made by the Colonization Society increases, and is rendered more permanent and well regulated, furnishing facilities for all the objects, for which the agency was created. The expenditures during the year, so far as they are yet known, of the appropriation for the prohibition of the slave trade, has amounted to $15,326.02, and there remains, of that fund, a balance of $47,391.39.

The manner in which the force assigned to the protection of our commerce, and the suppression of piracy, in the West Indies, has been employed, will be seen by the annexed letters and reports of Commodore Porter, marked C. The activity, zeal, and enterprise of our officers, have continued to command approbation. All the vessels have been kept uniformly and busily employed, where the danger was believed to be the greatest, except for short periods, when the commander supposed it necessary that they should return to the United States, to receive provisions, repairs, and men, and for other objects essential to their health, comfort, and efficiency. No complaints have reached this Department, of injury from privateers of Porto Rico, or other Spanish possessions, nor have our cruisers found any violating our rights. A few small piratical vessels, and some boats, have been taken, and establishments broken up, and much salutary protection afforded to our commerce. The force employed, however, has been too small, constantly to watch every part of a coast, so extensive as that of the islands and the shores of the Gulf of Mexico, and some piratical depredations have therefore been committed; but they are of a character, though, perhaps, not less bloody and fatal to the sufferers, yet differing widely from those which first excited the sympathy of the public, and the exertions of the government. There are few, if any, piratical vessels of a large size in the neighborhood of Cuba, and none are now seen at a distance from the land; but the pirates conceal themselves, with their boats, in small creeks, bays, and inlets, and finding vessels becalmed, or in a defenceless situation, assail and destroy them. When discovered, they readily and safely retreat into the country, where our forces cannot follow, and by the plunder which they have obtained, and which they sell at prices low and tempting to the population, and by the apprehensions which they are able to create in those who would otherwise give information, they remain secure, and mingle, at pleasure, in the business of the towns, and transactions of society, and acquire all the information necessary to accomplish their purposes. Against such a system, no naval force, within the control of this Department, can afford complete security, unless aided by the cordial, unwavering and energetic co-operation of the local governments; a co-operation which would render their lurking places on land unsafe, and make punishment the certain consequence of detection. Unless this co-operation be obtained, additional means ought to be entrusted to the Executive, to be used in such manner as experience may dictate.

The health of the squadron, and of Thompson's Island, has been much better than during the last season; yet many of our officers, and among them Commodore Porter, have suffered severely from disease, and several have died; most of the latter have fallen victims to the necessity, real or imagined, of visiting unhealthy places upon shore, which they were warned as much as possible to avoid, and which a sense of duty, no doubt, induced them to visit. A list of those who have died during the year, on that and other stations, will be annexed, marked D.

Some improvements have been made, and others are proposed, at Thompson's Island, by cutting the timber, clearing and draining the ground, and building store houses, and, if the means are afforded, it is confidently believed, that it will be made both comparatively comfortable and healthy, before the next summer and fall. A balance of $26,784.69 still remains of the appropriation of December, 1822, "authorizing an additional naval force for the suppression of piracy," but claims exist against it, to a large amount, which have not yet been presented.

Two of the small schooners, the Grayhound and the Jackall, purchased under the authority of that act, have been found "so much out of repair, that it was not for the interest of the United States to repair them," and were disposed of; and one other, the Wild Cat, it is feared, is lost, with her officers and crew, in a passage from Havana to Key West.

The force on that station has been in this way somewhat reduced, and it has been considered expedient to augment it, by the addition of the frigate Constellation, which will be ready to join it, as soon as men can be enlisted for the purpose. One of the sloops-of-war, now in the Mediterranean, will, probably, be ordered there in the spring, should circumstances permit.

The surveys directed by the act, entitled "An act authorizing an examination and survey of the harbor of Charleston, in South Carolina, of St. Mary's, in Georgia, and of the coast of Florida, and for other purposes," have not yet been completed.

Competent naval officers, have been ordered upon the service. It was thought useful to unite with them, in a part of the examinations, one or more of the corps of engineers, which could not be effected.

On application to the War Department, it was found that all the officers of that corps were so engaged, as to prevent the Secretary from detailing even one for this service. It is hoped, however, that such information has, in the meantime, been procured, respecting the places named, except St. Mary's, as will accomplish the purpose for which the law was passed, should Congress act upon the subject at this session. Should it be proposed, however, to fix upon a site for a naval depot in the Gulf of Mexico, I would respectfully suggest the propriety of entrusting the selection and purchase to the Department, after further and satisfactory surveys shall have been made.

Commodore Stewart, in the Franklin, arrived at New York in the month of August, having left Commodore Hull, with the frigate United States, the sloop-of-war Peacock, and the schooner Dolphin, in the Pacific. It is hoped that this force will be able to prevent depredations on our important commerce in that sea, and secure respect for our flag. Our commerce, however, has increased so rapidly there, and is scattered over so large a space, that an addition of one or more vessels would be made, if they were within the control of the Department.

This addition will become indispensable, should the government be disposed to make permanent provisions for the protection of our commerce, and other interests in the neighborhood of Columbia river, and on the northwest coast. Constant experience shows the importance of such augmentation of the number of our vessels, as will enable the government to add to the force both in the Atlantic and Pacific. Inconveniences are felt, and losses are sustained, by our citizens in both oceans, which might be prevented, were the means for their protection enlarged.

In the course of the year, several regulations have been adopted to promote efficiency and economy in the medical and other departments of the service, and some good is anticipated from them. It is impossible, however, to do all which is desired, without the aid of Congress. Several laws seem necessary to render the establishment economical and efficient. Among them are those which were under consideration at the last session, for building ten sloops-of-war, and reorganizing the navy. To these ought to be added a revision of the law for the better government of the navy, and the system of courts-martial. But especially some provision should be made for the education and instruction of the younger officers. We have now the light of experience on this point in the army, and its salutary effects are very manifest. Instruction is not less necessary to the navy than to the army. I refer to the views taken of some of these subjects in the reports made during the last session, and it will be my duty to develop them more fully in answer to a resolution of the Senate now before me.

The expenditures of the year are submitted in a report from the Second Comptroller, marked F, and the estimates for the next year is one from the Commissioners of the Navy, marked G. In the latter, it will be found that estimates have been made of the expense of certain necessary improvements at Thompson's Island, and for the repairs of four of our frigates, which policy and economy require to be placed in such a situation, that their services can be commanded whenever they shall be necessary.

We have, at present, no frigate which could be sent to sea, without large repairs, creating a delay which, under certain circumstances, might be injurious to the public interests.

The general estimate comprehends the several heads of expenditure, in the form supposed to be best fitted for keeping the accounts, with plainness and accuracy, most easily explained, best adapted to a rigid investigation of the expenses of the naval service, and, as far as practicable, conformed to the views of the House of Representatives at the last session, as understood at the Department. It is accompanied by explanatory statements of the several items, in great detail, exhibiting the propriety of the estimate, and the necessity of the appropriation.

The estimates for the marine corps, with the explanatory statements, are added and marked H.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

SAM'L L. SOUTHARD.

Copy of a letter addressed to the honorable Benjamin W. Crowninshield, chairman of the Naval Committee in the House of Representatives.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, December 21, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 14th inst., making certain inquiries respecting the suppression of piracy, to which I submit the following answer:

The nature and extent of the force required, must necessarily be regulated by the nature and extent of the evil to be repressed. The views of the Department, on this latter point, are contained in the annual report made to the President of the United States, and communicated by him to Congress, with his message, and to which I beg leave to refer you.

There have lately been very few, if any, vessels of a large size, engaged in piratical depredations, at a distance from the land. The naval force which has been employed, and which is stated in the report referred to, has succeeded in driving away, or destroying, vessels of that description, and has thus effected the immediate object for which it was created. But the evil has assumed another shape, for which this force does not seem to be well fitted. Our vessels, even the smallest, cannot follow the pirates into many of the creeks and inlets to which they resort; this must always be done in boats, which cannot be carried by them in sufficient numbers to be effectual; nor can the greater part of them, on account of their size, and the want of accommodations for water and stores, remain long at sea, so as permanently and effectually to watch even the most suspected places.

I would, therefore, respectfully recommend three or more frigates, or sloops-of-war, as an addition to the force now in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico, or as a substitute for the small vessels. The sloops would be as competent to the object as the frigates, and would be much less expensive. We cannot, however, detach that, or even a less number, from the stations where they now are, without weakening our squadrons too much.

It will be necessary to build them, which can be done in less time, and at less expense, than would require to repair and fit for sea the same number of frigates. Two, or perhaps three, might be finished in four or five months. These vessels would be able to lie or cruise steadily, and for long periods, where their presence was most needed; and, being well provided with boats, could pursue into any waters where escape was attempted.

In addition to this provision, our officers should be authorized to pursue the pirates wherever they may fly. The authority which has heretofore been given on this point, will be seen by the extracts from the orders to Com. Porter, hereunto annexed, and marked A. The right to follow should be extended to the settled as well as the unsettled parts of the islands: and, should this prove ineffectual, a resort will be necessary to such a general and rigorous blockade, as will make both the local governments and their subjects feel that their interest, as well as their honor, requires a respect for our rights, and the rights of humanity. For such an extremity, the proposed sloops-of-war will be indispensable. What warnings should be given, or demands made upon Spain, or what negotiations had with other governments, before this course be adopted, it is not my province to suggest. But, as these pirates are, essentially, robbers, living upon the land, and not upon the ocean, if the local governments cannot, or will not, prevent them from inflicting such serious injuries upon us, we must seek them where they are to be found, and so punish them, as to prevent a repetition of their crimes.

Should the foregoing suggestions be adopted, a law would be necessary, authorizing the building of the sloops-of-war, with an appropriation of $85,000 for the cost of each, and $61,086.50 for the annual support of each. Or the sums mentioned may be added to the estimates for the support of the navy; the amount for building, under the head of building and repairs of vessels; and the other under those of

Pay and subsistence	$31,391 50
Provisions	15,695 00
Repairs, including wear and tear	12,000 00
Hospital stores and medicine	2,000 00
	$61,086 50

In answer to your inquiry on the subject, I would suggest that it is not believed to be proper to designate, in any act of Congress, the disposition of the force; the only effect of which would be to apprise the pirates more fully of the mode and place of attack, and thus enable them more surely to escape.

It is proper to remark, that any naval force which we can apply to this object, will not be sufficiently extensive to cover, at all times, every part of the shores of the islands and Gulf of Mexico; and that some merchant vessels may, and probably will be caught, without other protection than that which their own strength affords. Hence, the suggestion of arming them is very obvious, and has been frequently made. The evils to be apprehended from it, however, are equally obvious. No sufficient pledge can be given, that some of them, if armed, and feeling their power, would not abuse it; and, in the present situation of the West Indies, and countries south of us, endanger our friendly relations, and commit acts almost as much to be deprecated, as those against which we are attempting to guard. The natural state of merchant vessels is the peaceful and unarmed state; and although permission to arm might, in this instance, free them from some of the evils to which they would be exposed without such authority, yet it is believed that few, whose only object is fair commerce, would avail themselves of the legal privilege. The expense and inconvenience of arming is great, and would be illy borne by a large part of the commerce now carried on, in that quarter, in American vessels. The danger does not seem to be considered so urgent as to compel them to do it. Convoy has been often declined, rather than submit to slight delays, or changes in the course of the vessel; and it is understood, that insurance is unusually low, and that the offices add little, if anything, on account of this risk. It may be effected to the West Indies, at one per cent. on the outward, and one on the homeward voyage; and, in some instances, at one and a half, embracing both, which is below the actual expense of arming.

It has been sometimes proposed that the expense should be met by the government, and protection afforded, by placing on board each vessel a number of marines, or soldiers; but this plan will at once be perceived to be impracticable, when the number of our merchant vessels is considered, with the different routes which they pursue, and the times at which they sail. The remedy must be extremely partial, or the expense enormous. The whole marine corps would, probably, not equal one-fifth of what would be required for a sufficient and equal distribution among all.

It has also been proposed to furnish convoy at stated periods. This could be done at periods of fifteen or twenty days, from some position on our coast, to some point which is considered beyond the danger. But to this there are, also, obvious objections. It would employ all our force in the Atlantic and prevent attention to other objects; an evil of too serious a magnitude to be encountered It would be impossible to extend the convoy throughout the whole cruise; and stopping at a given point, the pirates would immediately transfer and renew their attacks beyond that point, where the vessels would, in that case, be more unprotected than they now are. It would also destroy competition of enterprise among our merchants, and confine them all to the same time and course of navigation, an evil which they well know how to estimate. They would not accept your protection at such a price.

I do not, then, perceive, in any of the suggestions which have been presented to my mind, so cheap, efficient, and certain a remedy for the evil, as that which I have preferred; and, if it be adopted, we shall, after the proposed vessels are prepared, be enabled to dispose of the small schooners now employed in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico; a force which has been found exceedingly expensive, and injurious to the discipline and efficiency of the service.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant, SAM'L L. SOUTHARD.

Extracts of a letter to the honorable James Lloyd, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, of the Senate, dated December 29, 1824.

"I have the honor to state, that there are no 'cases of practical depredations, or other information on the subject,' in the possession of the Department, which are not referred to in the report accompanying the President's message to Congress."

"No reports of cases have been received, except those made by naval officers, of such as have come, in some way, under their own observation. No memorandum has been kept of the cases detailed in the public journals, but some of them have, occasionally, been enclosed to the commanding officer of the station, to afford him information in the discharge of his duties."

"The 'additional means alluded' to, as proper to be entrusted to the Executive, if an efficient co-operation of the local governments could not be obtained, were, three or four frigates or sloops-of-war, with boats for pursuit of the pirates; authority to pursue them, wherever they might attempt to escape, and authority to enforce a rigorous blockade, if other efforts should prove ineffectual."

"I have not supposed that it would be expedient to authorize, by law, our merchant vessels to arm. Should Congress entertain a different opinion on this point, and pass a law on the subject, it should embrace 'provisions and restrictions' similar to those contained in the 3d and 4th sections of the 'Act to authorize the defence of the merchant vessels of the United States against French depredations, passed 25th June, 1798.'"

Report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, of the Senate, on so much of the President's message as relates to piracy. January 10, 1825.

The Committee on Foreign Relations submit a report on so much of the President's message as relates to piracies:

That our commerce, for years, has been harassed, and the lives of our citizens destroyed by pirates issuing from the colonies of Spain, in the West Indies, is a fact derived not only from the message of the President, but is of universal notoriety. These outrages have been so long and so often repeated, and marked with such atrocious circumstances, that a detail of the particular cases would be as impracticable as unnecessary. Our government, with a view to protect our citizens, has resorted to the means within their power, by stationing a naval force near the places where the pirates resort—a measure also pursued by other powers. Every effort, heretofore, has been unavailing, to put an end to these atrocities. These desperadoes, acquiring confidence from impunity, becoming more ferocious from habit, and multiplying by recruits from the most abandoned of other nations, threaten the most disastrous mischiefs, justly alarming to that highly valuable and most respectable portion of our fellow citizens whose pursuits are on the high seas. It is manifest, as well from facts derived from other sources as from the message of the President, that a continuance of this evil is ascribable to the asylum afforded the banditti in the colonies of Spain. The government of the United States, cherishing the most amicable disposition towards Spain, has presented the subject, with great earnestness, to the Spanish government, demanding reparation for the past and security for the future. To these reiterated remonstrances, no answer was returned till very recently, and to this day, all that has been obtained is a promise of a satisfactory answer to the applications of the Government of the United States; although Spain has been solemnly warned that, if she did not promptly acquit herself of her obligations to us on this subject, our government would be constrained, from the nature of the outrages, to become its own avenger, and, availing itself of its own resources, protect the commerce and lives of the American citizens from destruction. In the same spirit of conciliation, an appeal has been made to the local authorities, accompanied with a request, that if, from weakness, they were unable to exterminate the hordes of banditti who took shelter from pursuit within their territories, that permission might be given to our forces to pursue them on land.

This has been denied, on the vain punctilio of national dignity. The posture in which Spain now stands, is that of connivance in these injuries, or incapacity to prevent them. "A sovereign who refuses to cause reparation to be made of the damages caused by his subject, or to punish the guilty, or, in short, to deliver him up, renders himself an accomplice in the injury, and becomes responsible for it." If the committee were of opinion that the refusal, on the part of Spain, was willful, and not the result of inability, they would, with a full view of all the consequences which the measure involves, at once recommend an appeal to the last resort of nations against Spain, and all her dependencies. But, believing, as they do, that courtesy requires that her refusal to do justice should be placed on the ground of inability—an inability resulting from causes which the committee intentionally forbear to enumerate, they content themselves with recommending only such measures as are believed to be indispensable effectually to reach the mischief. And hence they beg leave to present a bill with suitable provisions for the end designed.

Report from the Navy Department.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, January 12, 1825.

The Secretary of the Navy has the honor to present the following report, in answer to two resolutions of the Senate of the United States on the subject of piracies; one of which was passed on the 21st of December, 1824, and the other on the 23d of the same month:

Immediately after the passage of the law of the 20th of December, 1822, "authorizing an additional naval force for the suppression of piracy," the vessels contemplated in that act were purchased and prepared for sea, and, with others, placed under the command of Captain David Porter. They consisted of the sloops John Adams and Hornet, the brig Spark, the schooners Porpoise, Grampus, Alligator, and Shark; the Sea Gull, and eight small schooners; five barges, and one transport ship; in all, seventeen vessels, of different sizes, besides the barges.

On the 14th day of February, 1823, Captain Porter sailed from the United States, under orders dated the 1st of February, 1823, a copy of which is annexed to this report, and marked A.

The manner in which Captain Porter has performed the duty assigned him, and the "information" received from him, will be seen by the reports from this Department to the President of the United States, and communicated by him, with his message, at the commencement of the last and present session of Congress; and by paper marked B, which was unintentionally omitted in the report from this Department on the first of December last.

All the vessels above enumerated except four, have been uniformly employed in the object, so far as their size and the necessity of occasional returns into port for stores and repairs would permit. Of the four vessels above alluded to, the Alligator and Wild Cat have been lost, and the Grayhound and Jackall were sold, "being so much out of repair that it was not for the interest of the United States to repair the same."

There are now employed in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico, thirteen vessels and five barges; and the frigate Constellation will join the squadron in a few days, her crew being nearly completed. The disposition of the force has been left principally to the commanding officer, who, being in the region where its services were required, was best able to judge of the positions in which the vessels should be placed, and the particular duties each should perform.

The papers herewith transmitted, marked C and D, having been written in answer to letters from the chairman of the Committees on Naval Affairs of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, it appears to be proper to communicate them as part of the report from this Department.

SAM. L. SOUTHARD.

To the PRESIDENT of the United States.

Message to the Senate of the United States.

In compliance with two resolutions of the Senate, the first of the 21st and the second of the 23d December last, requesting information respecting the injuries which have been sustained by our citizens by piratical depredations, and other details connected therewith; and requesting, also, information of the measures which have been adopted for the suppression of piracy; and whether, in the opinion of the Executive, it will not be necessary to adopt other means for the accomplishment of the object; and, in that event, what other means it will be most advisable to recur to; I herewith transmit a report from the Secretary of State, and likewise a report from the Secretary of the Navy, with the documents referred to in each.

On the very important question submitted to the Executive, as to the necessity of recurring to other more effectual means for the suppression of a practice so destructive of the lives and property of our citizens, I have to observe, that three expedients occur: one by the pursuit of the offenders to the settled as well as the unsettled parts of the island from whence they issue; another, by reprisal on the property of the inhabitants; and a third, by the blockade of the ports of those islands. It will be obvious that neither of these measures can be resorted to, in a spirit of amity with Spain, otherwise than in a firm belief that neither the government of Spain, nor the government of either of the islands, has the power to suppress that atrocious practice, and that the United States interpose their aid for the accomplishment of an object which is of equal importance to them as well as to us. Acting on this principle, the facts which justify the proceeding being universally known and felt by all engaged in commerce in that sea, it may fairly be presumed, that neither will the government of Spain, nor the government of either of those islands, complain of a resort to either of those measures, or to all of them, should such resort be necessary. It is therefore suggested, that a power, commensurate with either resource, be granted to the Executive, to be exercised according to his discretion, and as circumstances may imperiously require. It is hoped that the manifestation of a policy so decisive will produce the happiest result—that it will rid these seas and this hemisphere of this practice. This hope is strengthened by the belief that the government of Spain, and the governments of the islands, particularly of Cuba, whose chief is known here, will faithfully co-operate in such measures as may be necessary for the accomplishment of this very important object. To secure such co-operation will be the earnest desire, and, of course, the zealous and persevering effort, of the Executive.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, January 13, 1825.

Report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, of the House of Representatives, on a resolution of the House of Representatives of 9th December, instructing them to inquire into the expediency of providing an additional naval force, and other means for the suppression of piracy. January 25th, 1825.

That they have had the subjects proposed in the said resolution under their consideration, and have made diligent inquiry into the operations of our naval force, which, for the last two years, has been employed in the Gulf of Mexico, for the protection of our commerce, and the suppression of piracy. In this investigation they feel a satisfaction in stating that the means employed have displayed the vigilance of the government, and the activity, zeal, and devotion of the officers and seamen who have been assigned to that perilous service; perilous, not from the numbers or courage of the enemy, but from the deleterious effects of a tropical climate upon natives of a more temperate region. The vessels procured for this service were better adapted to a short expedition, than to long and tedious cruises. They were too small to afford the room necessary to preserve the discipline and health of the officers and seamen assigned to them; yet, they enabled the commander to scour the coast, to penetrate into the shoal waters of the creeks and inlets, to the very margin of the land; and, in effect, the pirates have literally been driven from the ocean, and confined to their fastnesses and haunts upon the land. Accordingly, their principal depredations, for the last twelve or fifteen months, have been confined to occasional sallies in boats and small craft, within one or two leagues of the shore. While these depredations, however, have been more limited in extent and number, they have more frequently been attended with the most desperate and sanguinary destruction of the lives of the unfortunate victims.

It becomes necessary for the government to adapt the force to the existing character of the evil; and the committee are of opinion that the best species of force which can be employed in future, while the piracies are confined to small craft, are the boats and launches which are attached to larger vessels. Sloops-of-war of the largest class may be well provided with launches and boats, of which several might be constantly employed in ferreting out these marauders, and bringing them to condign punishment.

But the committee are of opinion that, though the addition of three or four sloops to our West India squadron, might, by constant vigilance, afford great additional security to our commerce and those engaged in it, yet they have reflected that these plunderers easily transfer themselves from one island to another; and when effectually hunted from one of their haunts, they are speedily found in parts where the unarmed trader, having no protection or means of defence, becomes an easy prey. They have, also, recurred to several instances, where a resolute resistance by a small crew of intrepid seamen has repelled the assailants, even when the disparity of force might have been expected to produce a different issue. From which it is manifest, that those wretches, who assume the vocation of pirates, are as dastardly as they are cruel, and may be generally repelled by a well armed crew, though not much exceeding the usual complement of the vessel.

The opinion has been expressed in some of the memorials of our principal cities, that the permission to the merchants to prepare a suitable armament for their defence, would be embraced at least to a sufficient extent to deter, in many instances, the attacks of boats from the shore, or to repel the foe in case he should attempt to carry by boarding. The committee believe, that if a considerable number of trading vessels should provide themselves for resistance, and a few instances of successful resistance should be the consequence, the effect would be highly salutary, and would greatly discourage these banditti, by rendering their vocation dangerous and fruitless. They are aware that the commerce of the West Indies is attended with too small profit to warrant any considerable increase of expense to the merchants and owners of vessels: and, as the protection of trade is the duty of the government, as well as required for the prosperity of our revenue and general resources, they therefore deem it sound policy to rely upon this measure merely as auxiliary to the most energetic efforts; and to the ample means placed at the disposal of the Executive.

The committee have not overlooked the notorious fact, that the local authorities of the West India islands, particularly those of Cuba and Porto Rico, have afforded shelter and protection to the pirates, and have given a character of boldness to the enterprises, which it may be impossible wholly to repress without resorting to measures which may induce those authorities to unite their means in earnest in the extirpation of those foes of the human race. Whatever may be the personal feelings of some of the local governors, they may, perhaps, find it difficult to restrain the cupidity by which a great portion of the community are so completely demoralized. In the Island of Porto Rico, a species of legalized plunder has been for several years tolerated, if not encouraged, by the chiefs of the island, which, if not so sanguinary as in other cases, has, in other respects, differed but little from ordinary piracy. It belongs rather to the duty of another committee to devise means suitable to meet an exigency so singular, and, at the same time, demanding the most prompt and vigorous measures.

While the utmost circumspection should be employed, in maintaining the rights and dignity of our country, not to violate those of other nations, it cannot be denied, that a scrupulous adherence to the letter of national law, in regard to the territories under the nominal jurisdiction of a nation remote from the scenes of action, distracted and feeble at home, and scarcely felt or feared in her remote islands and colonies, must amount to an indefinite denial of redress to our own citizens; must embolden injustice and violence, and impede or frustrate the most vigorous efforts of our naval force in the protection of our commerce against such an unhallowed combination of local jurisdiction and desperate outlaws.

The committee forbear to indicate the course which alone remains to remedy these outrages upon our rights and our dignity, not doubting that, from another source, we may soon see submitted, a plan which comports with our justice and moderation, as well as with our interest and security.

They respectfully submit a bill, in conformity with these views, for the consideration of the House.

Report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, of the House of Representatives, on piracy and outrages on American commerce by Spanish privateers. January 31st, 1825.

The Committee of Foreign Relations, to whom was referred so much of the President's message to Congress at the opening of the present session, as relates to piracy and the outrages committed upon our commerce by vessels bearing Spanish commissions, and the memorials from different quarters of the Union on the same subjects, availing themselves of the document accompanying the President's message to the Senate, of the 13th January, which have been printed by order of that body, present to the House the result of their deliberations upon the subject submitted to them:

From the commencement of the revolution, which has terminated in the separation of Spanish Continental America from old Spain, the commerce of the United States, in common with that of all other nations, has suffered frequent outrages from the vessels of the adverse parties, duly commissioned, with doubtful commissions, and from pirates who sought to conceal their true character by the use of the flag of some one of the belligerants. Constant efforts have been made by this government to redress injuries suffered, and to prevent future outrage. Congress have, at all times, been prepared to give, and have afforded all the means necessary for these purposes within their province.

The act of the third of March, 1819, was passed specially to protect the commerce of the United States, and punish the crime of piracy. It gave to the President power (a power, however, which the President possesses without an act of Congress) to employ the public armed vessels of the United States to protect our merchant vessels and their crews from piratical aggression and depredation, to authorize the detention, capture, and trial, of any armed vessels which attempted any piratical depredation, search, seizure, or restraint of an American vessel. It authorized our merchant vessels to capture armed ships not commissioned by a friendly power, and to recapture vessels taken by them, and it directed the condemnation of the vessels so captured or recaptured; it provided for the punishment of the pirates, when convicted by the competent tribunals. This act was limited to one year, but was continued in force by the act of May 15, 1820, for two years, and the first four sections made perpetual by the act of the 30th January, 1823.

The re-establishment of the constitutional government in old Spain, in March, 1820, inspired the strongest hope that the contest between Spain and Spanish Continental America would be soon amicably terminated in a manner satisfactory to the parties at war, to the commercial and civilized world, and to all the lovers of humanity, justice and liberty. The first movements of the regenerated government promised a speedy realization of this hope.

The Cortes of Spain directed negotiations to be opened with Spanish America; commissioners were appointed; but the contending parties did not take the same view of the great questions between them. old Spain would not admit the recognition of the independence of the Spanish American governments as the basis of negotiation; and the Spanish American governments would not negotiate without that preliminary recognition. While these abortive attempts at negotiation were made, there was a temporary cessation of hostilities in Venezuela. The war, however, was renewed in Venezuela before the negotiations were broken off. Fortune favored the Americans, and the European Spaniards were driven from the continent. During this desperate contest, General Morales, the commander of the Spanish forces, issued his extraordinary proclamation, declaring a coast of twelve hundred miles in a state of blockade, and interdicting all foreign commerce with the Spanish main, as inconsistent with the colonial law of old Spain. This proclamation has been the fruitful source of most of the evils since suffered by all commercial nations in the West Indies, and in the Gulf of Mexico. Numerous pirates, and swarms of privateersmen (subsequently degenerated into pirates), have preyed upon all neutral commerce. Protection to that of the United States should have been, if it has not been, afforded, against pirates, by the use of all the necessary means under the control of the Executive—by a vigorous exertion of the naval power; by incessant watchfulness on the seas, and on the coasts infested by them; rigorous examination of all suspected vessels of every size; ardent pursuit of the persons found flagrante delicto, wherever they sought refuge; careful prosecution, before the competent tribunals, of all the accused who were taken; unrelenting severity in inflicting punishment, where guilt was judicially established—against privateersmen, by appeals to the government of Spain, requiring, immediately, redress for the past, and security for the future; if made in vain, application should have been made to Congress to authorize reprisals, or to declare war, as the extent of the injury and a due regard to the condition of the Spanish government should have required. A further reference, however, to the past would not be useful. For the present, and for the future, if legislative provisions are necessary, they should be made.

Piracy at present exists in the same form as in the year 1822, when a species of naval force, supposed to be particularly adapted to suppress it, was placed at the disposal of the Executive. This force was believed to have answered the expectations entertained of it, as the President, at the opening of the last session of Congress, announced that "it had been eminently successful in the accomplishment of its objects." If further experience has shown that this species of force is inadequate to the accomplishment of the object, and that another may be advantageously substituted, there can be no doubt of the propriety of the substitution. This is a point, however, that the committee do not consider it their duty to examine; it belongs properly to another committee, the result of whose deliberations upon it has been already presented to the House. The merchants of the United States, who have, with the exception of our seamen, the deepest interest in this subject, suggest the propriety of suffering the owners of vessels to arm for their own defence. There is no law forbidding such defensive armament, nor is any law required to justify it. It is, however, asserted that the restraints upon the armament of merchant vessels are inconvenient and oppressive, and that they ought to be removed. The only provision on this subject is that which requires bond and security to be given to prevent an unlawful use of the armed vessel; a provision which should not be changed—an adherence to which the best interest of commerce requires.

The propriety of authorizing by law the pursuit of the pirates on land has also been a subject of consideration. The committee do not deem an act of Congress for this purpose necessary. The rule of international law is, that fugitives from the justice of one nation are to be considered in another as strangers entitled to protection, and having a right of residence—on the common principle that no nation has a right to punish a person who has not offended itself, nor is it bound to assist its neighbor in the execution of its criminal laws. Pirates are criminals against all nations, punishable in every tribunal; the common enemies of mankind; the duty of all nations and every man is, to hunt them down, that they may be delivered up to offended justice. Fresh pursuit of enemies into the territory of a common friend, is not universally admitted to be a right of war. Powerful nations never permit feeble neighbors to enter their territory for this purpose; but enter without scruple in pursuit of their enemies, the territory of such neighbors, unless restrained by the apprehension that the mutual friend seeks a fair occasion to become an ally against them in the war. Practically, the question is one not of right, but of relative power. The pursuit of a mutual enemy into the territory of a friendly or allied power, is a right of war; it cannot be deemed a violation of the sovereignty of that power; it confers a favor, and imposes upon him an obligation of gratitude.

The common enemy cannot avail himself of the protection of the territory of the third power, but by surrendering himself as prisoner of war; and in that event, if the force of the pursuer was the cause of the surrender, the pursuer might rightfully claim the benefit of the surrender. Under this rule, the pursuit and capture of pirates anywhere, and everywhere, may be justified. The Executive has acted upon it. Instructions have been given to our naval commanders to pursue and capture, on Spanish territory, pirates who seek refuge or concealment there. The government of Spain has been duly warned of the existence of these orders; it knows that they will be obeyed. No remonstrance has been made by it; no objections have, as far as the committee have been informed, been urged. The acquiescence of Spain is all that should be desired. A distinction is supposed to exist between pursuit of pirates on lands uninhabited, and those inhabited; and it is imagined that the authority of Congress is necessary to justify pursuit in the latter case, while, in the former, the power of the Executive is alone sufficient. The committee do not admit the correctness of this distinction. Fresh pursuit is justifiable in either case, if necessary to the capture of the pirate. There is greater danger of collision with the friendly power, when the object of pursuit flies into a settled country, and greater care is requisite to avoid giving offence; but the same principles apply to either case, and it is just as necessary that Congress should legislate to justify the capture of pirates, as to authorize the pursuit of them into any place of refuge, inhabited or unsettled.

From an attentive examination of the letters of the agent who was sent to Cuba to obtain information relative to the pirates who have long infested the coast of that island, it would seem that no fresh pursuit on land will eradicate the evil. Authority must exist to search in the suspected settlements for persons believed to be guilty of piracy, and for the evidence of their guilt, and to bring them before our tribunals for trial and punishment. This authority Congress cannot give, without making war upon Spain. It cannot be used without wresting from Spain her municipal jurisdiction. The evil lies too deep to be reached by any ordinary measures which foreign powers can apply to it.

The government of Spain must give to the local authority what it is said to want—sufficient strength to prevent and to punish crimes; it must perform its duties, or those who suffer from its neglect or weakness will be driven, by the necessity of the case, to apply the corrective. The committee would bring more distinctly into view the only efficient remedy, and recommend a resort to it, if they believed sufficient time had elapsed since remonstrances were made by our government to Spain, to prove incontestably that she wanted either the power or the will to do her duty, although they are aware that the conduct of any government, in applying that remedy, without previous concert with other nations, alike interested in the question, would be liable to misconception, and excite well-founded jealousies. The committee cannot doubt that the Executive, applying all proper means to prevent, to detect, and to punish, the crime of piracy, and pressing upon Spain and her local authorities that the honor and the interest of Spain require their best exertions for the same purpose, will not fail to confer with the great commercial nations, on the extraordinary measures to be used, if the object is not speedily accomplished by the faithful exertion of the powers of Spain.

The danger to which our commerce is exposed, and the injuries it has suffered from privateers, acting under regular or irregular commissions, are of a different character, and require a different remedy. The committee understand that outrages of this kind have almost, if not entirely ceased; for those which have been inflicted, or which may hereafter be inflicted, Spain is directly responsible. Reparation must be had; by negotiation, or by exercise of such powers as may, for that purpose, be vested in the Executive by Congress.

To guard against future injury, the safest resource is to enforce promptly ample redress for that which has been suffered. The committee have already referred to the injuries suffered in consequence of the proclamation of Morales. Those injuries are not yet redressed. The government of Spain has not attempted to justify a proclamation declaring, with a naval force insufficient to shut up the smallest port on the coast, a seacoast of twelve hundred miles in a state of blockade, nor the absurd pretension that the property of all neutral nations is, under the colonial law of Spain, liable to confiscation, if taken on its way to Spanish America; but the property of American citizens captured by privateers from the islands of Porto Rico and Cuba, and from Porto Cabello, is now withheld under these pretensions. The Spanish government having formally revoked the blockade, gives to the tribunals of Spain an excuse for the condemnation of all property seized prior to that revocation; an excuse of which they do not hesitate to avail themselves. Acting under instructions from the President of the 28th April, 1823, the minister of the United States at the court of Spain demanded satisfaction, in January, 1824, from that government, for the outrages committed from Porto Cabello, and the islands of Porto Rico and Cuba, upon the commerce of the United States, and for the wanton murder of one of our gallant officers in the harbor of St. John's, by the officer commanding the fort at its entrance. In September of the same year, Spain was again called upon to indemnify those who had suffered in person or property under the proclamation of blockade, or from the interdiction of neutral commerce to the Spanish main. In October, the just reclamations of our government were, for the third time, formally made to the government of Spain. No satisfaction has been given, no indemnity has been promised, nor has there been even a satisfactory excuse given for the delay to answer the just demands of the minister of the United States.

The character of the injury sustained, its origin, the period elapsed since it was inflicted, the formal and fruitless demand for reparation for more than twelve months, justify reprisals. An anxious desire not to act harshly to a government embarrassed by internal difficulties, and enfeebled by recent revolutions; the distance of the seat of the Spanish government, from the places in which the evils complained of originated; the death of the minister appointed by the Spanish government, on the eve of his departure to this country; and the recent selection of another minister, whose appointment and intended departure for the United States, has been communicated in an official letter, a translation of which is herewith presented to the House, induce the committee not to propose any legislative enactment, under the firm conviction, that this forbearance will give to Spain a new motive to make speedily ample reparation for the injuries sustained; and that if it does not produce this desired effect, it will justify, in the eyes of all nations, any and every step Congress may hereafter be compelled to take.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 24, 1825.

SIR: I have the honor of enclosing herewith, a translation of the only answer yet received from the Spanish government, in Mr. Nelson's notes on the subject of piracy and outrages on our commerce. It has been received since the communications to Congress of the previous documents were made.

I am, with great respect, sir, your most humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

JOHN FORSYTH, Esq., Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, H. R. U. S.

[Translation.]

Mr. Zea Bermudez to Mr. Nelson.

SIR: From the middle of September last, when I took possession of the appointment, which the kindness of the King, my august master, deigned to entrust me, I dedicated, by order of his Majesty, my attention to the different notes presented by you, relative to the claims of the American subjects, who thought themselves entitled to be indemnified by Spain for the losses which they have suffered in the seas of America A business so complicated, in which considerable interests are involved, presented so much more difficulty, by how much there were intermingled with it other interests and other claims of Spanish subjects against the government and subjects of the United States.

His Majesty, desirous of preserving the friendship and good harmony which happily subsists between both nations, and that, in faithful observance of existing treaties, both governments should terminate in a friendly manner, this delicate question, the legitimate rights and just pretensions of both being mutually conciliated, has thought that the most proper means for gaining this desired end, is to send immediately a minister plenipotentiary, to reside near the American government, who, by his information, prudence, and practical knowledge of the relations between both countries, may be at the same time, the interpreter and the executor of the just intentions of the King. In consequence, his Majesty has been pleased to appoint Don Jose de Heredia, his envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary in the United States of America. He will set out for his new destination as soon as possible.

I hasten to inform you of this, that you may be pleased to lay it before your government; and I avail myself of this occasion, to repeat to you the assurance of my most distinguished consideration. God preserve you many years.

Your most obedient servant, FRANCISCO DE ZEA BERMUDEZ.

SAN LORENZO, November 19, 1824.

Report of the Secretary of the Navy, accompanying the President's message of December 3d, 1822.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, November 30, 1822.

The President of the United States:

SIR: In compliance with your request, I have the honor to transmit to you herewith, sundry papers, numbered one to five, inclusively, which contain the information desired.

No. 1. List of piratical vessels, &c., captured by vessels of the navy of the United States.

No. 2. List of vessels of the navy of the United States, in actual service.

No. 3. List of vessels of the navy of the United States, in ordinary.

No. 4. List of vessels built and building, under the act for the "gradual increase of the navy;" and also, a general view of improvements at the several building yards.

No. 5. Copies of correspondence between the commanders of our cruising vessels, and the Spanish authorities.

All of which is respectfully submitted. SMITH THOMPSON.

No. 1.

Statement of captures of piratical vessels and boats, made by vessels of the United States navy, in the West Indies.

Four piratical schooners, of about forty tons each, and one sloop, of twenty-five tons, in all carrying about one hundred men, captured by Lieutenant Commandant L. Kearney, in the United States brig Enterprise, at Cape Antonio, Island of Cuba, October 16th, 1821, in the act of robbing the American ship Lucies, American brig Aristides, and English brig Larch; burnt two of the piratical schooners; the other two, and the sloop, were sent into Charleston, S. C., and condemned.

Schooner Moscow, captured by Capt. Robert Henley, in the sloop-of-war Hornet, October 29, 1821, sent into Norfolk.

A boat laden with goods, captured by Lieutenant Commandant Ramage, off Cape Antonio, November 8, 1821; took out the goods, and destroyed the boat; crew escaped.

A schooner of about 35 tons, captured by Lieutenant Commandant Kearney, 21st December, 1821; crew, about 25, escaped.

Six piratical vessels captured by Lieutenant Commandant Ramage, January 7, 1822; burnt five of them, and manned one, took three prisoners, and destroyed their depot, &c., on the coast of Cuba.

A large barge taken by gun vessel Revenge, 7th March, 1822; she was deserted by her crew, and evidently fitted for piratical purposes.

Three piratical launches and four barges, captured by Lieutenant Commandant Kearney, in the United States brig Enterprise, at Cape Antonio, on the 8th March, 1822, destroyed.

Two piratical schooners captured by Lieutenants Commandants Perry and Gregory, in June, 1822, three pirates prisoners.

Spanish privateer Palmyra, alias Panchita, captured by Lieutenant Commandant Gregory, August 16, 1822, sent into Charleston, South Carolina.

Five piratical vessels captured by Captain S. Cassin, commanding United States ship Peacock, on the 28th and 30th September, 1822; burnt two; found eighty-nine bags coffee concealed in the woods by the pirates; two of the vessels sent to New Orleans.

A Dutch sloop was re-captured from pirates by Captain John H. Elton, commanding United States brig Spark, January, 1822, and the prize crew, seven men, were sent into Charleston, South Carolina.

Portuguese ship Mariana Faliero, captured by Lieutenant Commandant R. F. Stockton, in the United States schooner Alligator, sent into Boston.

No. 4.

Vessels built and building under the law for the gradual increase of the navy, with a general view of improvements completed at the several building yards.

Columbus, 74 guns. Launched in ordinary at Boston, with a roof over her to protect her from the rain, sun, &c.

Ohio, 74 guns. Launched in ordinary at New York, with a roof over her to protect her from the rain, sun, &c.

North Carolina, 74 guns. Launched in ordinary at Norfolk, and now covering with roofs to protect them.

Delaware, 74 guns. Launched in ordinary at Norfolk, and now covering with roofs to protect them.

One, 74 guns. At Boston, nearly finished; house over her, and perfectly protected.

One, 74 guns. At Boston; frame raised; under a house; perfectly protected.

One, 74 guns. At Portsmouth, N. H.; nearly finished; under a house; perfectly protected.

One, 74 guns. At Norfolk, Va.; about half finished; house over her; perfectly protected.

One, 74 guns. At Philadelphia; keel laid; frame nearly out; house now building over, and probably raised by this time.

Potomac, 44 guns. Launched, and hauled up on the inclined plane at Washington, where she now lies, under a house, perfectly protected from the sun, rain, &c.

One, 74 guns. At Washington; about half finished.

One, 44 guns. At Philadelphia; nearly finished; house over her; perfectly protected.

One, 44 guns. At New York; frame getting out, and nearly ready to raise.

One, 44 guns. At Portsmouth, N. H.; in forwardness; house over her; perfectly protected.

The frames of the other frigates authorized to be built, excepting a few pieces yet to be delivered by the contractors, and nearly all the other materials excepting the iron, are procured and placed in situations where they will probably not sustain any immediate material injury.

Two steam battery frames are securely doposited under cover at the Washington Navy yard.

One steam battery frame is securely deposited under cover at New York.

Two engines are put up, and in a state of preservation at New York.

The building yards are in as good a state as the means placed at the disposal of the Department would allow; but to erect the necessary warehouses, repair wharves, cover some of the vessels now building, and to erect suitable sheds over the timber, for its preservation, there will be required for the year 1823, the sum of $150,000.

General view of improvements completed at the several building yards, in 1821 and 1822.

At Norfolk: timber dock filled up, and house built over new ship of the line.

At Washington: inclined plane, with a house over it; large warehouse; sail loft and rigging loft.

At Philadelphia: foundation of a new ship laid; house built over a frigate, and house now raising over a ship of the line.

At New York: foundation of a new ship laid; house built over a frigate; low ground filled up to an extent to afford sufficient room to work on.

At Boston: foundation of a new ship laid; a house built over a ship of the line; a blacksmith shop erected; the timber dock piled and improved; cover placed over the frame of a 44; about two acres of ground leveled.

At Portsmouth, N. H.: foundation of a new frigate laid, and a house erected over it.

No. 5.

Copies and extracts of letters and reports, exhibiting a general view of the correspondence between the commanders of our cruising vessels in the West Indies, and the Spanish authorities.

U. S. Frigate Macedonian, Havana, May 6, 1822.

Sir: I have the honor to inform you that I arrived here on the 28th ultimo. My passage was somewhat protracted by chasing, out of my course, suspicious looking vessels among the islands, and by having two days under convoy an American schooner, that requested me to see her safe past Cape Antonio. On my arrival, I saluted the captain general and the admiral, receiving from each, in return, gun for gun, agreeably to previous arrangement. On the 29th, I had an interview with the captain general relative to the business with which I am charged by Mr. Adams, the Secretary of State. On the 30th, I addressed a communication to him on the subject of landing our boats and men upon the coast of Cuba when in pursuit of pirates. I enclose a copy of my communication, as also of the captain general's answer; and you will perceive he declines acceding to the proposition I made to him. I think it preferable to pursue one object at a time with the government here, and I shall therefore drop this subject for the present, renewing it when my correspondence in regard to the Florida documents is terminated. He certainly ought, and perhaps will consent to our landing upon those parts of the coast that are uninhabited, and where, though within his jurisdiction, he is utterly incapable of exercising any authority. There are many such places on the coasts of this island.

The measures adopted by the captain general, and to which he refers in his letter to me, consist simply of a proclamation, in March last, establishing certain regulations with respect to clearances of coasting vessels, launches, and other boats. These regulations, I understand, are not strictly enforced; and, even if they were, they are altogether insufficient for the suppression of piracy along the extensive coast of Cuba. As this proclamation has been published in the American newspapers, I do not think it necessary to send you a copy.

I regret to state that I have not met any of our cruisers either at this port or off Cape Antonio, nor have I been able to gain any information as to where they probably now are. It is some time since any of them were here. The British frigate Tribune is here, from Porto Bello, and is about to sail for England with specie.

I have the honor to be, &c., JAMES BIDDLE.

Hon. SMITH THOMPSON, Secretary of the Navy.

Captain Biddle to Governor Mahy.

U. S. FRIGATE MACEDONIAN, Havana, April 30, 1822.

SIR: I have the honor to represent, that the commercial relations between the United States and Cuba are already very considerable, and that they would unquestionably be more considerable, if rendered more secure from unlawful depredations. As these relations, too, are mutually beneficial, it is important to both parties that they should be effectually protected. For this object the Government of the United States, on its part, has employed an adequate naval force, which is placed under my direction and control. But, as the depredations have been committed chiefly in open boats, immediately upon the coast, and off the harbors, it is important that we should have your excellency's co-operation. I have, therefore, the honor to propose that your excellency should so far co-operate with me as to sanction the landing, upon the coast of Cuba, of our boats and men, when in the pursuit of pirates. This measure would be promotive of our common benefit—is indispensable to the entire suppression of piracy, and is not intended in any manner to infringe upon the territorial rights of your excellency. It will operate against those only whose atrocious crimes render them obnoxious to every regular government, and should place them without the protection of all law.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient and very humble servant,
JAMES BIDDLE.

His excellency Don NICHOLAS MAHY, Captain General and Governor of Cuba.

Governor Mahy to Captain Biddle.

[Translation.]

I am too sensible of the importance of the commercial relations which exist, and may continue, between the ports of this island and those of the United States, which I am desirous of cultivating, not to have adopted measures to put a stop to depredations which might obstruct them along the extensive coasts of this island, under my jurisdiction. I repeat, that such measures have been adopted, and have been made public; and with the zealous co-operation with which you inform me you are charged, we shall doubtless effect shortly a happy extermination of those enemies, who, under all colors, have laid waste and committed robberies, both upon the high seas and every coast, without respecting any flag.

With respect to the permission you solicit, for landing upon this coast with troops and people in boats, for the purpose of pursuing those pirates, I cannot and must not consent to it. I repeat that the necessary measures have been adopted to defend my territorial jurisdiction, and for the apprehension of every description of outlaws.

All which I communicate in answer to your official letter of yesterday. God preserve you many years.

NICHOLAS MAHY, Captain General of the Island of Cuba.

JAMES BIDDLE, Esq., Commanding United States ship Macedonian.

HAVANA, May 2, 1822.

Extract from a report of Lieutenant Francis H. Gregory, commander of U. S. schooner Grampus, to Captain James Biddle, commanding the U. S. naval forces in the West Indies—relating to the capture of the Pancheta, dated—

U. S. SCHOONER GRAMPUS, St. Thomas, August 24, 1822.

I have the honor to acquaint you, for the information of the honorable Secretary of the Navy, that I arrived at St. Bartholomews on the 2d of August; sailed again on the 7th with convoy for St. Thomas. On the morning of the 9th fell in with two Spanish cruisers off Tortola, who demanded permission, and claimed a right to board the convoy, which being peremptorily refused, they hauled off. The same day I arrived at St. Thomas and received from Captain John Souther, of the schooner Coquette of Georgetown, D. C., the enclosed deposition, having been plundered by those vessels. On the 14th I left St. Thomas, with two valuable vessels, bound to Curacoa, and on the evening of the 15th saw an hermaphrodite brig, hovering upon our weather quarter, apparently a cruiser; continued my course without regarding her; at daylight made her ahead and gave chase; at half-past nine, having gained considerably upon her, she hoisted English colors; changed them to Spanish at 10, and fired a gun to windward, and at half-past 10 hove to, and set a white flag at the fore. On nearing her I perceived her to be the pirate that had fired upon and plundered the Coquette, and therefore considered it my duty to arrest her. At 20 minutes past 11 the Grampus was laid under her lee, within pistol shot, and her surrender demanded as a pirate, which she affected not to understand, and answered me to that import. While repeating the demand, he poured into us a full volley from his small arms and cannon, which was instantly returned, and continued three minutes and a half, when he struck his colors, a complete wreck, having one man killed and six wounded, and in a sinking condition. The boats were dispatched instantly to their relief, and it was only owing to the great exertions of Lieutenant Voorhees, that she was prevented from going down, having received three shots between wind and water, one of which injured the pumps. The Grampus received some trifling injury in her sails and rigging, but not a man hurt.

The captured vessel proved to be the notorious privateer Palmyra, formerly the Pancheta, from Porto Rico; carries one long brass 18, and eight 18-pound carronades, and a crew of 88 men. They acknowledged the robbery of the Coquette, and the only excuse given by the officer is, that they could not prevent those things happening now and then. Several of the plundered articles were found on board.

ST. THOMAS, August 10, 1822.

Personally appeared before us, Captain John Souther, commander, and in part owner of the schooner Coquette, of Georgetown, D. C., who, being duly sworn upon the Holy Evangelist of Almighty God, deposeth and saith: That he is a native born citizen of the United States of America, and that, while on a voyage in said vessel to the West India islands, and on his passage from St. Bartholomews to St. Thomas, on the morning of the 9th of August, 1822, at 5 A. M. or thereabouts, he was fired at by a sail in chase, upon which, the deponent saith, he immediately hove to. Was boarded by an officer and boat's crew under Venezuelian colors; they immediately demanded his papers; after examining them, they commenced searching the vessel, then went into my cabin and searched the berths, chests, &c. They took from the vessel stock, and clothing from the officers and men. The deponent further says, she was an hermaphrodite brig with a red streak, and one long gun midships, and several others, not knowing the exact number.

JOHN SOUTHER.

Extract of a letter from Lieutenant Commandant Francis H. Gregory to the Secretary of the Navy.

I have the honor to inform you that this vessel, accompanied by the Palmyra, alias Pancheta, was safely anchored in this port on the 12th, after a passage of fifteen days from St. Thomas. The Palmyra was captured on the 16th of August, to the southward of St. Croix, by the Grampus, after a short action, in which she was principal sufferer, as detailed in my reports to Captain James Biddle, commander of the United States naval forces cruising in the West Indies; copies of which have, for your information, already been forwarded to the Department.

It was my wish and intention to have entered a more northern port, but light and adverse winds, and the great number of prisoners on board, obliged me to make the nearest port, and that as soon as possible. The prisoners, seventy-six in number, have been safely lodged in jail, committed for piracy. At least one-third of them are of the Sugar Key gang, who have come to Porto Rico for the purpose of covering their villany with Spanish commissions. All the original documents respecting this vessel have been placed in the hands of the United States district attorney, and the vessel libeled. Several of her crew have turned informants, and I expect a great scene of villany will be exposed.

I frequently saw gentlemen from Porto Rico while at St. Thomas, and was informed that several small privateers were fitted out there, which, if not looked after in time, will certainly commit some very serious depredations upon our commerce, as they are, in reality, nothing but pirates; most of their crew being from the establishments of Cuba, and to their thirst for plunder add a deadly desire of revenge whenever they fall in with a defenceless American.

Extract of a letter from Lieutenant James Ramage, commander of the United States schooner Porpoise, to the Secretary of the Navy, dated St. Thomas, July 9, 1822.

Having sailed from St. Bartholomews on the evening of the 6th instant, I fell in, the next morning, with two brigs of war, bearing the Mexican flag. I run down, with our colors flying, between them; and, when opposite to each, received a gun from the one to windward, which was instantly returned from this vessel; shortly after, I received a similar salute from that to leeward, which was promptly replied to; both vessels, on firing, hauled down the Mexican, and hoisted the Spanish national colors. I then ranged alongside the brig to leeward, observing her crew in a state of extreme confusion; they opened an irregular and ill-directed fire of grape and musketry, but without any effect. I was in the act of giving orders to return our broadside, when hostilities ceased, and I directed Lieutenant Curtis to board the brig; and examine her papers. They proved to be H. C. Majesty's brigs Palmyra, of fourteen guns, one hundred and thirty men, and G. Boves, of eight guns and one hundred men, both from Cadiz. The enclosed is a literal copy of a letter addressed me by the senior commanding officer.

I now hasten to communicate the intelligence received by me at this place, which I believe to be entirely authentic: that several Spanish privateers, of considerable force, have lately been equipped from the Island of Porto Rico, for the purpose of capturing all vessels sailing to or from the ports on the coast of Spanish America, in possession of the patriot forces, under the plea that they are violating a system of blockade established by the government of Spain. These privateers have already made several captures of American and other vessels, which have been carried to remote ports in the Island of Porto Rico, and will doubtless be condemned. The injury that will result to the commerce of our country from this system of pretended blockade will be very serious, if not timely checked by an adequate force in this quarter; and, as I have no means of communicating from hence with Captain Biddle, I consider it my duty to lay the present information before you.

S. N. B. G. Boves, at sea, July 3, 1822.

M. Ramage, U. S. Sc. Porpoise:

Sir: I am sorry you will be incomoded with me by firiying you this morning, being the case that we thought you were Patriots, and we have commission from our government to blockade all the men ports, and happened that must all the vessels from the men hoisted and fight with the American flag, we took you to be one of them.

I hope therefore you will forgived the uncasionally affair.

I remain your sincear, &c.,

PABLO LLUAGER.

To the Captain of the U. S. Sc. Porpoise.

United States Schooner Porpoise, Curacoa, July 22, 1822.

Sir: I had the honor to address you on the 9th inst., from the Island of St. Thomas, communicating the injuries committed on our commerce by Spanish vessels of war near to Porto Rico, in consequence of their pretended blockade of the coasts of Spanish America. I have now to inform you that the same causes have produced the same effects in this quarter, and that four American vessels have been condemned at Port Cabello for a breach of blockade. The naval force of Spain in these seas consists of an old 44 gun frigate (one of the Russian contract,) a brig and schooner. These are employed in furnishing supplies to Porto Cabello from this island, and yet with such a force and so employed, they uphold the monstrous principle of blockading a coast of more than 1,200 miles in extent. It does not appear that any injury has been committed on our commerce by the vessels of the Columbian republic.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

JAMES RAMAGE.

Hon. Smith Thompson, Secretary of the Navy.

Extract of a letter from Lieutenant James Ramage, commander of the United States schooner Porpoise, to Captain James Biddle, commanding the naval forces in the West Indies.

Under a plea of a breach of blockade, the Spanish squadron in this direction, capture all vessels bound to or from ports in possession of the Columbian republic. The naval force of Spain, now here, consists of an old 44 gun frigate, the Ligera, (one of the Russian contract,) an 18-gun brig, the Hercule, and a schooner; the whole of which are employed supplying Porto Cabello with provisions from Curacoa; yet, with such a force, and so employed, they uphold the monstrous principle of blockading a line of coast of more than 1,200 miles in extent.

Copy of a letter to Captain Laborde, commanding his Catholic Majesty's frigate Ligera.

United States Schooner Porpoise, Harbor of St. Ann, Curacoa, July 21, 1822.

Sir: I have received from the master of the American schooner Antelope, a communication of which a copy is herewith transmitted to you. From this statement it appears that a very serious injury has been done by you to the rights and property of citizens of the United States, by the capture and subsequent condemnation of an American vessel and cargo, pursuing a lawful commerce; but it is hoped that more just reasons will be exhibited on your part for the course pursued, than those stated in the communication referred to.

I have received information that the American vessels named underneath, have been carried into Porto Cabello, and there condemned, under the pretext of a breach of blockade of the coast and harbors of the Spanish main. In consequence, thereof, it becomes my duty to demand from you the release of all vessels and property so seized, and further to state, that the United States cannot recognize such a system of blockade, to the manifest injury of their commerce, where the force of Spain is so evidently inadequate to its fulfillment.

I am, &c., &c.,

JAMES RAMAGE.

To Capt. Laborde, commanding H. C. M. Frigate Ligera, Curacoa.

Statement of Arthur Edgerton, mate of the brig General Andrew Jackson.

Arthur Edgerton, mate of the brig General Andrew Jackson, taken by the privateer General Pereira, on the 22d July, states, as nigh as he can remember, the log book being taken from him, Capt. Langdon and the cook were sent in the brig to Ponce, and the mate and men were taken on board the privateer, having been robbed of every article of clothing, except what they had at the time on their backs. The men had recently left the United States, and had each a new suit of good clothes, many of which can, at most hours, be seen at this place, worn by the crew of the privateer in public. Except being robbed of clothing, knives, razors, &c., were well treated on board the privateer, where they remained about seventeen days—were then put into the puntilla (prison) without food, until the afternoon of the third day. The keeper of the prison observing the wants of these men, sent word to the captain of the privateer, "that he must furnish them daily with food, or he would be punished;" which was complied with.

Captain Spence to the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting correspondence with the Governor of Porto Rico, marked A to G, inclusive.

U. S. Ship Cyane, St. John's, Porto Rico, September 3, 1822.

Sir: After a passage of twenty-five days from the Chesapeake, during which we experienced an alternation of calms and head winds, I anchored in this harbor. I found no small excitement existing, produced by the capture of the Pancheta. The presence of a ship of our force was perhaps seasonable; and possibly may have been the means of preventing unpleasant consequences to the Americans here. Before I could enter upon the business specially delegated, I was informed of the imprisonment of several citizens of the United States, taken from the brig General Jackson, captured and sent into Ponce. As no American ought to be restrained of his liberty, in any quarter of the world, one hour, without just cause, I addressed his excellency Don Francisco Gonzalez de Linarez, demanding their release. My letter, marked A. is herewith transmitted. The men being liberated, I felt myself at liberty to enter upon the execution of my instructions, and immediately addressed him upon the subject of the capture of American vessels by privateers out of the Island of Porto Rico. A copy of my letter, marked B, is herewith enclosed. On the 27th ult. I addressed to his excellency letter C, annexing memorandum No. 1, being a list of vessels sent into the different ports of the island, for adjudication. On the 28th I received from his excellency a reply to my representations, which is herewith transmitted, with other subsequent communications from him. I then addressed to him letter D, with copies of the accompanying documents, 2, 3 and 4.

Some of the circumstances of the capture of the Pancheta being known, for the purpose of preventing the ill effects of distorted and prejudiced representations, and to allay the sensations of which his excellency speaks, I addressed to him, on that subject, letter marked E; receiving several reiterative communications, of which I obtained but very imperfect translations. I replied with letter marked F, and came to the consummation of the duty confided to me in letter G, and I trust, in the declarations there made, I have neither gone beyond the letter or spirit of my instructions; having been influenced throughout the whole correspondence, by a strong desire to discharge a delicate trust with becoming graciousness; and, while making known the sentiments of the American people, and the determination of my government, to conciliate, by a friendly style and manner, the good feelings of those in authority, all of whom are men of high standing, and justly estimable. I hope my remarks on the laws of blockade will be considered by yourself and the President pertinent and proper. I believe I conceived your views on that subject. It cannot, however, be expected that an officer who embarked at the age of eleven on an element where the accomplishments of a scholar are not required, should shine in a correspondence of a diplomatic cast; especially when depending wholly on his own feeble capacity. What I have written on this occasion, has been with a heart glowing with American feelings, with an enthusiastic admiration of our laws, institutions, and great men; if, therefore, a little egotism should occasionally appear, I plead this in extenuation.

The hospitality of the port has been freely and fully extended to my ship, and the personal attentions of those in authority have been gratifying to me and my officers. To a system of privateering they are opposed; and the governor will do all in his power to discourage its continuance. Indemnification for the past, I fear, we shall have to look for to the treasury of Spain.

I shall be active in attending to everything in which the interest of our commerce is concerned; and shall endeavor to sustain the American character by a manner gentle, yet firm—taking on myself no responsibility, keeping constantly in eye the reciprocal rights of nations, and your instructions.

I have the honor to remain, sir, your obedient servant,

ROBERT TRAIL SPENCE.

P. S.—I shall leave these seas the last of October for Africa.

The Hon. Smith Thompson, Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

A.

United States Ship Cyane, St. John's, Porto Rico, August 26, 1822.

Sir: Instructed to proceed to Porto Rico, to communicate with your excellency, in relation to the infringement of American rights, by vessels fitted out at different ports of this island, I had scarcely anchored with this ship, ere I learned that several citizens of the United States (after experiencing the most brutal treatment from a gang of desperadoes, belonging to an armed schooner, now in, and said to be of this place,) have been imprisoned, and are at present in confinement.

These American citizens, I understand, were taken from the brig Andrew Jackson, while peaceably pursuing their vocation on the high seas, under the flag of the United States.

So gross a violation of the usages of all civilized nations is calculated to excite universal abhorrence; and the just indignation I am persuaded your excellency must feel on being informed of such an atrocious act, renders it only necessary that it should come to the knowledge of your excellency, to cause the immediate release of said citizens, and the prompt and salutary punishment of those violators of the laws of nations and humanity.

With most perfect consideration, &c., ROBERT T. SPENCE.

B.

UNITED STATES SHIP CYANE, Porto Rico, August 27, 1822.

SIR: I am directed to call the attention of your excellency to the capture and detention, by privateers fitted out from this island, of several American merchant vessels, while pursuing a lawful commerce during a time when the United States enjoy profound peace with all nations.

Your excellency will readily perceive, that under such circumstances, the violation of American rights here complained of, calls for a speedy interposition of justice and authority. Justice, that a restitution of these captures may be made; and authority, to prevent a repetition of similar outrages.

I will, as soon as possible, transmit to your excellency the names of the vessels to which this complaint refers, with a statement of the circumstances attending their capture; confidently believing that your excellency will adopt, as early as possible, such measures as shall, in your wisdom, be deemed sufficient to arrest these depredations, which, in some cases, can be viewed in no other light than piratical.

The flag of the United States, floating in every ocean, gurantees protection to all who lawfully sail under it; the invasion of rights identified with this flag, it would neither be honorable, wise, nor expedient to permit; and that trade to which, as a neutral, the United States have claim uninterruptedly to pursue, cannot be molested.

The American commerce, second to none for magnitude, enterprise, and fair dealing, must, to insure a continuance of these constituent features, be preserved inviolate; and the protection necessary to effect this object, the government of the United States is determined to afford, whether in the seas of the Mediterranean, Pacific, or Caribbean, where outrages, tending to degrade the flag under which they are committed, are daily occurring; these, as far as they shall come under the cognizance of your excellency, I am persuaded will be restrained and prevented.

The amicable and friendly footing, on which Spain and the United States are at this time, convinces me, that nothing more than a proper representation of these facts is required, to call the subject-matter to the immediate attention of your excellency.

Fully believing this, I have the honor to remain, &c., ROBERT T. SPENCE.

C.

UNITED STATES SHIP CYANE, St. John's, Porto Rico, August 28, 1822.

SIR: Having informed your excellency that I have been instructed to proceed to this place, to communicate with your excellency on the subject of captures made by privateers, fitted out of this island, of American vessels, while pursuing, in time of peace, a lawful trade, I now have the honor to transmit a memorandum, embracing the names of these vessels, and the circumstances attending their seizure.

It appears that some of these vessels have been sent in, and after a grievous detention, declared to be a "bad prize;" subject, however, to pay all the costs of suit, and one-third of the expenses of the privateer.

To one as profound in all matters of law and equity as your excellency, this must appear a strange proceeding; a proceeding, calling, with much emphasis, for the interposition of your excellency's authority, to remedy evils bearing a character calculated to diminish the high respect heretofore entertained by the world, for the equitable decisions of Spanish courts.

A pretended violation of blockade, it appears, is the pretext for sending into the ports of this island, vessels navigating the sea under the American flag. The whole, therefore, may be resolved into two descriptions of cases: The first, comprising vessels seized and again released as "bad prizes," paying the whole of the costs of trial, and a portion of the expenses of the privateer.

The principles of equity applicable to such cases are too simple to require exposition. The innocent are not to pay the penalty of another's guilt or imprudence. If an American is interrupted in her voyage, captured and vexatiously detained, until a judicial investigation determines her to be a "bad prize," it seems to me self-evident, that all costs of the suit should be paid by the captors, in whom the wrong is; add to this, that proper damages should be levied on the aggressor, that the sufferer may be fairly indemnified, and the "privateersman" be restrained in future by a fear of being, in all similar cases, called upon to make good the injury resulting from his wantonness. Without such a check, what is there to limit the mischief done by men of this order, who, stealing from their dens and lurking places, pollute the ocean with the blood of defenceless sailors, and gorge their cupidity with the spoils of plunder and ravage?

The good of every nation, and the honor of some, require that so foul a system should be made to cease, that every navigable sea may be rendered safe to the honest efforts of enterprise.

The second description of cases to which I wish to call the immediate attention of your excellency, are those vessels sent in under a pretext of attempting to enter a blockaded port. The pacific policy uniformly pursued by the government of the United States, the just and liberal principles by which it has been governed through all its various struggles, to treat all nations as friends, and, especially, to be on the most friendly footing with Spain, entitle the citizens of America to the privilege of navigating the seas, without molestation on pretexts so flimsy as those of violating a "blockade" which has never existed de facto.

It is well understood that a blockade, to carry with it the penalty of forfeiture, must be conformable to the established opinions of those distinguished civilians who have fully and ably expounded this subject.

In the first place it must be practicable; it must be defined within limits commensurate with the ability; a stationary force must intervene; the vessel entering must be warned off; these, and other qualifications are essential to constitute a blockade, as now understood by the President of the United States and other great statesmen. If, then, such is the form and nature of a blockade; if the constant presence of a stationary squadron, adequate to the purpose of intercepting all vessels, is indispensable; how is it that a whole coast, without any definite limit, should be under the ban of interdiction, without any visible force, consequently without the first requisite of a blockade?

While such pretexts for spoliation exist, and the commerce of the United States is thus devastated, the relations of love and friendship now existing between the two nations must be shaken, and a state of things produced such as I am persuaded your excellency will feel desirous to avert.

I trust I shall be excused these remarks, made to one by whom the principles of "blockade" are fully understood, and whose experience is such as to render the application of them in all cases just and proper.

It will readily occur to the wisdom and justice of your excellency that injuries sustained by American citizens from illegal seizure and detention, carry with them a fair claim to indemnity; and that where there has been a manifest partiality in the courts deciding on some of the cases presented for your consideration, that the arm of authority should be extended to remedy, and to require more equitable decisions. In these cases it is hoped and expected that your excellency will direct a revisal of the proceedings of subordinate tribunals, that such of the citizens of the United States as have suffered by them may be immediately made whole in their property, and receive damages for unjustifiable detention.

Your excellency, influenced by high and honorable motives, will doubtless see the propriety of ordering all American vessels now detained to be forthwith released, and the punishment of marauders who have tarnished the dignity of the Spanish character by acts of inhuman treatment to citizens of the United States; by the most flagrant outrages; by a prostration of all the usages of civilized society; thereby bringing the commercial world into a state truly to be deplored, tending to arm man against his brother man, and to make safety nowhere but in strength and habitual hostility.

Submitting this application to the early attention of your excellency, and calling upon your excellency immediately to interpose your authority to prevent a continuance of these causes of just complaint, and confidently believing that your love of justice, order and humanity will impel you promptly to meet the wishes of my government on this subject.

I remain, with the most perfect consideration, your excellency's obedient servant,

ROBERT T. SPENCE.

List of American vessels captured by Spanish privateers, and sent into the different ports of Porto Rico.

Barque American, Emery, master, of Kennebunk. This vessel was sent into Cape Roxo, by the Spanish felucca La Carmen, tried, and declared a bad prize, but sentenced to pay all costs of the trial, and one-third of the charges of the privateer for her detention; and was compelled, in consequence, to sell her cargo at a great sacrifice.

Brig Sam, of Portland, Crowell, master. This vessel was sent into Cape Roxo by the same privateer, and it is understood that she is still detained.

Brig Bliss, of Baltimore, Dungan, master. This vessel was sent into Cape Roxo by the same privateer, and after a vexatious detention was suffered to proceed, paying all the costs of trial, and one-third of the expenses of the privateer.

Brig Elizabeth, of Georgetown, West, master. This vessel was sent into Aguadilla by the privateer General Pereira, for trading to a blockaded port.

Brig General Jackson, of New York, Langdon, master, captured and sent into Ponce, by the schooner General Pereira, at which place she is now detained; and part of her crew, after very inhuman treatment, imprisoned at this place.

D.

United States Ship Cyane, St. John's, Porto Rico, August 29, 1822.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's letter of the 27th instant, (a translation I have but this moment been able to obtain,) in which you refer me to a communication made to Mr. Lord, the commercial agent, in reply to an application made the day previous to my arrival, for the release of the crew of the brig Andrew Jackson. The sentiments and expressions of your excellency in relation to this outrage are duly appreciated. I felt persuaded that the harsh and illegal imprisonment of unoffending American citizens could not have come to the knowledge of your excellency; and there are other outrages of similar character not yet known, I am convinced, to the high authorities of Porto Rico.

I beg leave to enclose you a copy of a letter from the government interpreter at Ponce, into which place the brig Andrew Jackson was taken. This is a representation from a Spanish functionary, and your excellency, I doubt not, will agree with me, that if the facts there stated are true, there is no other appellation by which I could designate the perpetrators of such inhuman severity, save that of "desperadoes;" men restrained by none of the gentle obligations of humanity.

It is a fact, notoriously known, that the crew of the "Andrew Jackson," illegally and harshly confined at the time of my writing to you, had been previously robbed of everything save the clothes they had on at the time of entering the prison; their jack knives were even cut from their laniards! If to men who can thus act, who can divest a defenceless "American tar" of everything, even to his wearing apparel, I could apply any other distinguishing name than that of "robber," I confess to your excellency I should have selected a milder epithet.

A glance at the history of the past, displays, in the Spanish character, the principles and high sentiments of which you speak; the island before us bears full testimony of their enterprise and greatness. It was to those sentiments and principles I appealed, when I requested your early attention to proceedings calculated to sully that dignity of which every "Spaniard" is justly proud.

The capture of the Pancheta by a vessel of war of the United States was entirely unknown to me on my arrival at St. John's; but, I can confidently assure your excellency, that you have been misinformed as to some of the circumstances attending it. I have understood that the privateer Pancheta has been of considerable annoyance to our commerce in these seas, and that, falling in with the United States schooner Grampus, fired into her. The consequences that would result from such an act, may be conceived by your excellency.

The instructions given to officers of the American navy are such as to render it impossible that they can be the aggressors—and the feelings that have characterized them, will always ensure, in these unhappy rencounters, humanity and tenderness.

Vessels have formerly been sent into ports of the United States on apparent good grounds, such as attempts on our commerce; but, in all instances in which cause for condemnation did not appear, heavy damages were awarded, and the sufferers made more than whole in their property. Retribution is there always at hand.

In the case of the Pancheta, I beg leave to assure your excellency, there must have been great cause for the course pursued. As to the indignity offered to the flag, your excellency, I trust, is misinformed; for no officer in the navy dare stand before the tribunal of the American people, justly charged with having violated the best constituents of the American character—magnanimity and knightly generosity.

This unfortunate occurrence has grown out of the necessity of sending an armed force to these seas, for the purpose of convoying our vessels, and of guarding them against the violence that has been committed upon them by privateers infesting the ocean for the purposes of plunder. If, in the execution of this duty, rendered necessary by the state of things, calamities unavoidably occur, they must, doubtless, be deplored by the lovers of peace and concord, but cannot be chargeable to us as voluntary acts.

It is an indisputable fact, although not known to your excellency, that the captain's and mate's trunks of the American brig Sam, captured and taken into Cape Roxo, were broken open, while himself and crew were on board the privateer, and four hundred and twenty Spanish dollars taken from them; also one trunk of Madras handkerchiefs and other merchandise. These are transactions unknown to your excellency, having taken place prior to your excellency's arrival—they are the acts of privateersmen, from which it would be absurd to infer the character of a wise and liberal nation, like that of Spain.

Seeing the evils that result from the course pursued by privateers out of this island, I call upon your excellency, in the name of humanity, and of that benign policy which has marked the course of our political career, to place such checks and restraints upon their proceedings as will, in future, secure the American commerce from interruption, and those vexatious seizures of which the citizens of the United States justly complain.

These complaints, resting on the foundation of wrongs of an aggravated nature, which cannot be justified by any previous aggressions of American citizens, convince me that they will not be sanctioned by one of your excellency's liberal and comprehensive views.

Confident of this, I feel much satisfaction in complying with that part of my instructions which requires me to learn from your excellency how far privateers fitted out of this island are authorized to capture and bring in for adjudication, the vessels of the United States pursuing a lawful commerce. Information on this head will serve to explain fully the footing on which our maritime relations rest in this quarter.

Be pleased to accept my best wishes for the health and happiness of your excellency, and believe me, with the most perfect consideration,

Your excellency's obedient servant,

ROBERT T. SPENCE, Captain U. S. Navy.

P. S.—I also enclose a copy of a letter, from the master of the brig General Andrew Jackson, relative to his treatment from the crew of the Spanish privateer General Pereira.

E.

U. S. Ship Cyane, St. John's, P. R., August 30, 1822.

Sir: Since the receipt of your letter, alluding to the capture of the Pancheta, some of the circumstances attending it have come to my knowledge.

It appears that this privateer has been for a considerable time engaged in intercepting our vessels, frequently boarding them, and exercising an intolerable inquisition, vexatious of themselves, sufficient to call for a remedy, but would not have occasioned any offensive measures on the part of American cruisers. The instructions given to our commanders confine their discretionary powers within limits too circumscribed to admit of their being led to an act of indiscretion. They are imperatively commanded to do nothing that can tend to interrupt the harmony existing between the United States and other powers, whose maritime rights have ever been respected, and never designedly infringed.

The immediate cause of the Pancheta's capture was her having been guilty of several recent acts of plunder, and her having, but a short while previously to her "mishap," taken a number of articles from an American trader, to which the captain and crew made oath. If these facts are as represented, and I am induced to think they will be incontrovertibly established, they certainly must be denominated acts of piracy committed upon the citizens of the United States, who have been made to suffer, in their property and feelings, by these and similar outrages. Add to these causes, on being hailed, she fired into the United States schooner Grampus. What armed vessel could expect to fire at an American ship of war with impunity?

These circumstances, when the affair shall be judicially investigated, I am inclined to think will be found substantially correct; if otherwise, there is an equity in the government and laws of the United States that never was appealed to in vain. There is a sentiment of honor and generosity in the American people that will sustain the injured, be he friend or foe—that will redress wrongs with "even-handed justice."

I have deemed it proper to make this statement, with a view to allay the sensations of which your excellency speaks, as having been excited by this transaction; sensations I have had occasion myself to experience, with the additional aggravation of knowing that the authors of them, lurking in obscurity, were sheltered from personal amenability; while, in the present case, your excellency must feel an assurance that the standing of the active officer in command of the Grampus, as well as the magnitude of the affair, are such as to pass them in review of the whole American people—a never-erring ordeal; that laws, and not individuals, will decide as to the criminality of the cruise of the Pancheta, and will determine how far that officer was justifiable in arresting her depredatory excursions.

American cruisers have been sent to these seas to protect our trade; there existed a crying cause—the means of mischief were accumulating—impunity had produced audacity; and the ocean washing the shores of these islands, which the interest of the world requires should be unprofaned by the path of the plunderer, had become the theatre of outrage and rapine. American citizens had suffered in their property and sacred persons. To remedy these evils, our officers will be active, vigilant, and unweary; producing, by their conduct, a conviction that when acts are perpetrated, such as the Pancheta is charged with having committed, there is no escape. There must be safety in peace, or its best objects are defeated; there must be security on the great "thoroughfare" of all nations, otherwise its best purposes are perverted.

Persuaded that your excellency will not consider this as unreasonable, and that you will see the consequences I have pointed out as the inevitable result of causes herein set forth,

I remain, with the most perfect consideration, your excellency's obedient servant,

ROBERT T. SPENCE, Captain in the Navy.

His excellency Don Francisco Gonzalez de Linarez,
Governor of Porto Rico, &c., &c.

F.

U. S. Ship Cyane, St. John's, Porto Rico, September 1, 1822.

Sir: Your letters of the 28th and 31st ultimo, in answer to several communications from me, have been duly received—translations of which, I have but this moment been able to obtain.

In relation to the capture of the Pancheta, I beg permission to repeat, that it must be considered as a disaster growing out of the unjustifiable conduct of her crew, and as one of the retributive results of an abuse of her cruising license.

We require that our lawful commerce shall be unmolested; that our vessels shall not, from frivolous causes, and on pretexts of which every privateersman constitutes himself a judge, be intercepted, and subjected to inquisitorial scrutiny, and American citizens made to incur intolerable inconvenience and expense. Evils like these have a remedy, which the most forbearing would not expect should remain dormant.

I am convinced your excellency has been incorrectly informed as to the treatment of the crew of the Pancheta, which you represent as cruel and unmercifully harsh. The officer commanding the schooner Grampus is well known for his humane feeling, and I am persuaded that all practicable and proper mildness was exercised on the occasion.

It is not to a discussion of the laws and principles of "blockade," that I am desirous of calling your excellency's attention—they are settled and established by the concurrent opinion of the wisest statesmen, and are no longer doubtful. "Blockade" is not a mystical arcanum; it involves certain practical rules, amply explained, and, I am persuaded, well and fully understood by your excellency.

It was to invite a just application to these principles, according to the acknowledged usages of the age, that I was led to present the subject to your excellency's attention, thereby to prevent the seizure of our vessels, and to do away a pretext, often alleged, for sending them in for adjudication.

It was presumed that your excellency's powers extended to the correction of evils, existing within the range of your authority; that you had the means of checking the licentiousness of privateering; and that, seeing the pernicious effects of it, you would feel every disposition to shield the commerce of the United States, by the interposition of seasonable restraints.

While I feel confident that your excellency will adopt, with promptitude, measures calculated to ascertain the extent of the grievances set forth in my communication of the 28th ultimo, I must beg leave again to repeat the expression of my hope and expectation, that you will cause all American vessels, now illegally detained in the ports of this island, forthwith to be released, and equitable damages awarded such of the citizens of the United States as have suffered, either in property or person.

The well known character of your excellency, for wisdom and justice, inclines me to believe that these expectations will appear reasonable and right, and that they will be fully and satisfactorily realized by

Your excellency's obedient servant,

ROBERT T. SPENCE, Captain in the Navy.

His excellency Don Francisco Gonzalez de Linarez,
Governor of Porto Rico, &c., &c.

U. S. Ship Cyane, St. John's, Porto Rico, September 3, 1822.

Sir: I have had the honor to receive several communications from your excellency, in reply to letters addressed to you on subjects of very considerable moment.

Your professions of respect for the laws of nations, and your determination of making them, and the laws of the "constitutional monarchy of Spain," your guides, and the intention you express of inquiring into the matters set forth in my official representations, &c., &c., are all properly appreciated, and will, doubtless, prove highly efficacious. The laws of Spain, no doubt, are all which the accumulated experience of ages, and the united wisdom of sage men ca n make them; and, if administered by one of your excellency's impartiality, would, I am persuaded, afford no good cause of complaint.

I had the honor, a few days since, to present, for the consideration of your excellency, some of the proceedings and decisions of the constituted tribunals of the island; whether such are just or legal, your excellency can decide—to me they seem novel and extraordinary; and, with a knowledge of some of the minor circumstances attending those vexatious trials, I cannot refrain from saying they appear strange.

I am sure your excellency will deem it due to the dignity of the "constitutional monarchy" you represent, to cause American citizens to be indemnified for the loss sustained by such adjudications as your excellency has been invited to investigate. It is but right and just to expect this of the laws of Spain; and while I indulge a belief that such will be the course pursued, I am led to call your attention to the policy of doing away all future occasion of dissatisfaction, by rendering the owners, or captains, of the privateers out of Porto Rico, more accountable.

In my letter of the 29th ultimo, I requested that your excellency would do me the honor to state how far these privateers are authorized by the authorities of the island to capture, and bring in for adjudication, vessels of the United States engaged in the pursuit of a lawful commerce. This information your excellency has not thought proper to afford.

From the facility with which these small privateers are fitted out, and from the description of persons on board some of them, it has occurred to me that they are not made to enter into penal bond to restrain, and produce responsibility, for the excesses they may commit, but are left to cruise "ad libitum." Under such circumstances, transgressions are inevitable.

It is against the aggressions of such vessels, I remonstrate—protesting against the improper privilege they have exercised, of intercepting and detaining, on the high seas, vessels of the United States engaged in a lawful trade. And it becomes necessary for me to inform your excellency, and wish it should be known to all whom it may concern, that, with a view to prevent, as far as practicable, a state of things fraught with mischief and abuse; to guard against a maritime anarchy, to which the commerce of the United States cannot be subjected; to secure to its citizens safety, and to its flag the benefits of peace and neutrality; and to preserve the harmony my government is desirous should exist between the two nations; I shall, as far as possible, give convoy to American vessels navigating these seas, and shall forbid, and prevent, any interruption or detention by any privateer or armed vessel, and shall feel it incumbent on me to treat as an enemy, and send to the United States, any privateer, or armed vessel, that shall cause hindrance to the lawful voyage of an American vessel, or shall be found violating the flag of the United States, and the laws of nations.

Satisfied that your excellency will look upon this course of conduct as moderate, and unavoidable, I remain

Your excellency's very obedient servant,

ROBERT T. SPENCE, Captain in the Navy.

[Translation.]

Don Fr. Gonzs. de Linarez to Captain Spence.

Sir: On the receipt of your official letter, informing me, generally, of the depredations and excesses committed by the Spanish privateers of this island, upon the vessels of the United States, as I was informed, and in particular, upon the brigantine General Andrew Jackson, by the Pereira, I resolved to take the first care with respect to the last, by the information of an individual of that nation, Mr. Judah Lord.

My answers to this gentleman showed him my surprise, and the just indignation which so unlawful a transgression of the law of nations had excited in this government; the precautions which it took to prove its truth; and the justice which animated it to punish the crime with all the rigor of the Spanish laws; laws capable of themselves of what he, on his part, can desire.

The same, therefore, that I said to Mr. Lord I repeat to you; animated with the same principles and sentiments which govern the conduct of the supreme government of the Spanish nation, and which form its character, acknowledged by all the nations of the earth.

But I am certain that you have not been well informed regarding the destruction and spoliations generally committed upon all American vessels. I have the most repeated proofs of the regular conduct of the Spanish privateers towards these vessels, which they have examined and respected in very considerable numbers, showing to the world that they are not desperadoes, because they know not what it means, nor thieves because they are Spaniards.

Would to God that some vessels of the military marine of the United States had observed towards Spanish vessels, and towards the national military flag, a conduct so regular! I am certain that there would not have been the disagreeable sensations which now exist from it.

When I speak to you, sir, in this manner, I do it with respect to the scandalous attack made by the United States schooner-of-war the Grampus, upon the Spanish privateer the Palmyra, which she attacked in the midst of peace, killed and wounded several of her crew, treated with indignity the Spanish flag, confined in chains the greater part of her crew, and that at the very moment when an officer was about going on board of her to present her papers, and to comply with the law of nations.

You will perhaps be informed of this attack, seldom seen in the history of civilized nations; and no doubt if you have been so with truth, as I am, you will have had the same horror and disgust; because it is impossible otherwise to consider the most sacred conventions trampled upon, and the majesty of a nation insulted; of a nation which has always preserved her rights, and which, oftener than once, has given public proofs of her constancy, and of her never having been offended with impunity.

For my part, with respect to this event, I do nothing else but point it out to you as a particular piece of news, because its decision belongs to the supreme government of both nations. As a functionary of mine, I will not depart from the path which it has pointed out to me; justice shall always be my guide. I shall respect the laws of nations; and I shall punish, with the laws in my hand, such Spanish subjects as shall transgress their duties.

God preserve you many years. FR. GONZ. DE LINAREZ.

PORTO RICO, August 27, 1822.

No. 2.

[Translation.]

Don Francisco Gonzalez de Linarez to Captain Spence.

PORTO RICO, August 28, 1822.

SIR: I have just seen your official letter of yesterday, relative to the depredations which are said to have been committed by Spanish privateers against the vessels of the United States.

As this communication is substantially the same as the former, it appears only necessary to repeat my yesterday's answer; but, wishing to give you new proofs of the justice and good faith of the Spanish government, I will enter into new explanations.

I am persuaded that the armed privateers of this island have not committed, upon the vessels of the United States, the scandalous crimes with which your personal concern has been raised, or a mistake has entered into your mind. They have been examined by many, and have, without the least injury, continued their voyages; and doubtless, in a short time, you will be convinced of a truth so notorious.

I only speak of the privateers armed in this island, and am very far from making an apology for those that have been armed in other provinces, because I am ignorant of their conduct; and although it may have been criminal in this manner, it belongs not to my authority to punish them.

But if it is very strange that, even when there were some trifling excesses, energetical remonstrances were made for them; and the attack of the American schooner Grampus has been passed over in silence, or considered as a circumstance of no moment, in which the particular circumstance occurred of her belonging to the navy of the United States; what comparison can ever exist between the detention of a vessel, and even committing some pitiful and contemptible depredation (if such has been done), and the attack of the other, to destroy her in a perfidious manner, to cause the death, and imprisonment of the crews in chains; and what is more, insulting and trampling upon the Spanish military flag? Who ever so openly violated the maritime law of nations? And who, after such a violation, will attempt to declaim against injuries either imaginary or immensely less?

In fine, the peace between two nations, as Spain and that to which you belong, sir, is a blessing for the preservation of which I am ready to become a sacrifice; therefore I do not hesitate to assure you that the laws will be enforced in as far as they have been transgressed; and therefore I consider myself entitled to require the same frankness and consideration from you, notwithstanding my having explained myself so rudely; because our respective governments will do what they think proper, and will do what is most just for the well being of their people.

God preserve you many years.

PORTO RICO, August 31, 1822.

SIR: I have the honor to answer the note which you were pleased to address to me, under date of 28th instant, relative to the indemnification which ought to be made to the American vessels detained by privateers of this island, and condemned to pay costs, after being declared innocent by the courts of justice; and, also, relative to the nullity and illegality of the blockade declared against the ports of Terra Firma, for the reasons which you are pleased to give as your opinion.

The principles established by the maritime law of civilized nations are not unknown to me, nor the causes which have influenced the declaration of blockade against the ports occupied by the insurgents; nor even the maritime military force by which this declaration can be, and has been supported; yet, as on one hand my authority, being circumscribed to a province at a distance from those places, has no influence, nor can have, in any official acts; and, on the other, subjects of this nature belong, by their character, to the examination and decision of the supreme governments of the nations, it is my duty to avoid all interference in them, and to confine myself to the circle of my functions.

I have before me the note which you were pleased to enclose to me in your said official letter, containing the vessels detained, with the circumstances in which they have been, and the consequences which have ensued. I owe it to the justice, to the unalterableness of my principles, and to the rectitude of the government which I represent, to declare to you that I shall take all the provisions within my power to elicit the truth of what has occurred with respect to the detained vessels, repeating that you may rest assured that the laws of the kingdom shall judge and decide upon them, without the possibility of any alteration in their legitimate application. Neither partiality nor personal interest, nor the passions, shall have any voice or take any part in the decisions; the law shall dictate, and all (I the first) shall submit to it.

God preserve you many years. FRANCIS GONZALEZ DE LINAREZ.

SIR: I have just received the translation of your official note of the 29th ult., and which is an answer to mine of the 27th, containing, also, the former acknowledgment of the letter of the interpreter de Ponce, which was communicated to me by Mr. Lord, a citizen of the United States; and now recently of the declaration of Mr. Arthur Edgerton, mate of the brig Andrew Jackson, in which I have had the pleasure of reading that he and his companions, detained on board the privateer, had been well treated.

You will be pleased, sir, to let me know the things which have been plundered from the detained vessel, and claim the damages which have ensued on her detention. I have taken all the measures which were in my power, for eliciting the truth of the facts, in the manner provided by the laws of Spain; and when, according to them, the delinquents are tried and convicted, they shall be punished; then the tribunals established by the constitutional law of the monarchy will take cognizance, to which the power of judging and applying the laws, is exclusively granted—principles from which it is impossible for me to deviate, as it is with respect to those which rule in the United States, for any functionary to deviate from them.

You may rest assured, that, if the authorities appointed there to try crimes of this class, are inexorable in their conduct, admitting nothing but law and justice, those which are in the territory of the constitutional monarchy of Spain, summoned for that purpose, will never yield in their principles of justice, and in the fulfillment of their duties. To them it belongs to try by the laws, and to apply them, and to the political government of the people to enforce the execution of the legal decisions of the judicial power, and to watch over the observance of the laws, by taking care that no one break them.

God preserve you many years.

SIR: Your official note of the 30th ult. has informed me of the intelligence which has reached you of the motives which the schooner Grampus had for the hard and unexpected treatment of the Spanish privateer, the Palmyra.

My former communications have shown you what my principles are, and what my conduct has been in this matter, as a faithful observer of the fundamental laws of the Spanish monarchy. The truth of what has happened in that capture, will be the result of a legal investigation, in which sinister informations, which partiality or personal interest often dictate, have no part. When that shall have been elucidated in the way which the laws require, our supreme government will decide with justice what is proper.

God preserve you many years.

[Translation.]

Don Francisco Gonzalez de Linarez to Captain Spence.

SIR: I have the honor to answer your official note of the 1st inst. Its object is—1st The good conduct of the schooner Grampus in the capture of the Pancheta; 2d. The necessity under which the government is of putting a stop to the operations and irregular conduct of the privateers towards American vessels; 3d. To procure the immediate liberation of those that may have been detained in the ports; 4th. Prompt indemnification for the losses they have sustained.

On making the enumeration of these matters, I must call your attention to my former answers, because they have already been treated of in them implicitly and explicitly. Notwithstanding, I will repeat to you that the decision upon the justice or injustice, the validity or invalidity, the legality or illegality, of the blockade on the coast of Terra Firma, is beyond my authority; that the privateers are informed by the ordinances of their cruise of their respective obligations, for the transgression of which they will be responsible, and punished by the laws, in the same manner as in similar cases the privateers of the United States would be by the justice of the government, if they should transgress the limits which should be prescribed to them, but without this transgression they should not be responsible; lastly, that, by the political constitution of the Spanish monarchy, the functions of the judicial power are clearly designated, the government being totally prohibited from being joined with them; and one of the great props of civil liberty consisting in this clear separation. To preserve interior tranquillity and security; to procure public prosperity; to maintain established order; to watch over the observance of the laws; to publish them; to cause the execution of the decisions of the courts of justice to be in all its parts an agent of the government—here, sir, you may see the circle of my functions.

God preserve you many years.

PORTO RICO, September 9, 1822.

Extract of a letter from Captain Robert T. Spence, commander of the United States ship Cyane, to the Secretary of the Navy, dated —

ST. JOHNS, Porto Rico, September 5, 1822.

Since my letter of the 3d instant, transmitting my correspondence, I have had a conversation with the governor, who begs me to be assured, that all he can do, shall be done to meet my wishes, in relation to the privateers fitted out of the island; that those already out were equipped before he assumed the government; that he is opposed to it, both in his private and public capacity; that future restraints shall be placed upon them; and that he will remedy all abuses, as far as he has the power. That the brig Andrew Jackson he had ordered to be set at liberty; that he should inquire into the cause of her detention; and, unless good and sufficient reasons can be given, he will take steps to cause the judge to be removed. In fine, that he will do his utmost to keep the laws of nations inviolate. That, upon the subject of blockade he can do nothing; it was a question that must be settled between the two governments; the blockade had been declared by General Morillo, it was recognized, and the consequences of violating it were inevitable; over this question he had no control.

List of the names and force of the privateers fitted out from the various ports of the Island of Porto Rico.

Palomo—A full rigged brig, pierced for twenty guns, carries six guns (18-lb. carronades) has a complement of one hundred and thirty men. Fitted out from this port, and now on a cruise.

Pancheta—An hermaphrodite brig, pierced for sixteen guns, carries ten to twelve guns, has a complement of one hundred and twenty men—captured by the Grampus.

Schooner General Pereira—Pierced for sixteen guns; carries six to eight guns, and has a complement of eighty men; is fitted out from this place, and now in this port.

Schooner Bruquena—Carries four guns and fifty to sixty men, fitted out from this port, and now on a cruise.

Schooner Hora de la Mar—Fitted out from Foxardo, and now on a cruise; carries one gun and forty men.

Flechera la Carmen—Fitted out from Porto Cabello; carries four guns, and a complement of fifty men.

Besides the above, there are (I am informed) three or four other small privateers, from the different ports of this island, of the names and force of which I have no knowledge.

Official communication from the Department to Commodore Porter.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, February 1, 1823.

SIR: You have been appointed to the command of a squadron, fitted out under an act of Congress of the 20th of December last, to cruise in the West India seas and Gulf of Mexico, for the purpose of suppressing piracy, and affording effectual protection to the citizens and commerce of the United States. Your attention will also be extended to the suppression of the slave trade, according to the provisions of the several acts of Congress on that subject, copies of which, and of the instructions heretofore given to our naval commanders thereon, are herewith sent to you. While it is your duty to protect our commerce against all unlawful interruption, and to guard the rights, both of person and property, of the citizens of the United States, wherever it shall become necessary, you will observe the utmost caution not to encroach upon the rights of others; and should you, at any time, be brought into discussion or collision with any foreign power, in relation to such rights, it will be expedient and proper that the same should be conducted with as much moderation and forbearance as is consistent with the honor of your country and the just claims of its citizens. Should you, in your cruise fall in with any foreign naval force, engaged in the suppression of piracy, it is desirable that harmony and a good understanding should be cultivated between you; and you will do everything on your part, that accords with the honor of the American flag, to promote this object. So soon as the vessels at Norfolk shall be ready for sea, you will proceed to the West Indies, by such route as you shall judge best for the purpose of effecting the object of your cruise. You will establish, at Thompson's Island, usually called Key West, a depot, and land the ordnance and marines to protect the stores and provisions; if, however, you shall find any important objection to this place, and a more suitable and convenient one can be found, you are at liberty to select it as a depot.

You will announce your arrival and object to the authorities, civil and military, of the Island of Cuba, and endeavor to obtain, as far as shall be practicable, their co-operation, or at least their favorable and friendly support, giving them the most unequivocal assurance, that your sole object is the destruction of pirates. The system of piracy which has grown up in the West Indies, has obviously arisen from the war between Spain and the new governments, her late provinces, in this hemisphere, and from the limited forces in the islands, and their sparse population, many portions of each being entirely uninhabited and desolate, to which the active authority of the government does not extend. It is understood that establishments have been made by parties of those banditti, in those uninhabited parts, to which they carry their plunder, and retreat in time of danger. It cannot be presumed that the government of any island will afford any protection or countenance to such robbers. It may, on the contrary, confidently be believed, that all governments, and particularly those most exposed, will afford all means in their power for their suppression.

Pirates are considered, by the law of nations, the enemies of the human race. It is the duty of all nations to put them down; and none, who respect their own character or interest, will refuse to do it, much less afford them an asylum and protection. The nation that makes the greatest exertions to suppress such banditti, has the greatest merit. In making such exertions, it has a right to the aid of every other power, to the extent of its means, and to the enjoyment, under its sanction, of all its rights in the pursuit of the object.

In the case of belligerents, where the army of one party enters the territory of a neutral power, the army of the other has a right to follow it there. In the case of pirates, the right of the armed force of one power to follow them into the territory of another, is more complete. In regard to pirates, there is no neutral party; they being the enemies of the human race, all nations are parties against them, and may be considered as allies. The object and intention of our government is, to respect the feelings as well as the right of others, both in substance and in form, in all the measures which may be adopted to accomplish the end in view. Should, therefore, the crews of any vessels which you have seen engaged in acts of piracy, or which you have just cause to suspect of being of that character, retreat into the ports, harbors, or settled parts of the island, you may enter, in pursuit of them, such ports, harbors, and settled parts of the country, for the purpose of aiding the local authorities, or people, as the case may be, to seize and bring the offenders to justice, previously giving notice that this is your sole object.

Where a government exists, and is felt, you will, in all instances, respect the local authorities, and only act in aid of, and co-operate with them; it being the exclusive purpose of the United States to suppress piracy, an object in which all nations are equally interested; and, in the accomplishment of which, the Spanish authorities and people will, it is presumed, cordially co-operate, with you. If, in the pursuit of pirates, found at sea, they shall retreat into the unsettled parts of the islands, or foreign territory, you are at liberty to pursue them, so long only as there is reasonable prospect of being able to apprehend them; and in no case are you at liberty to pursue and apprehend any one, after having been forbidden so to do by competent authority of the local government. And, should you, on such pursuit, apprehend any pirates upon land, you will deliver them over to the proper authority, to be dealt with according to law, and you will furnish such evidence as shall be in your power, to prove the offence alleged against them. Should the local authorities refuse to receive and prosecute such persons, so apprehended, on your furnishing them with reasonable evidence of their guilt, you will then keep them, safely and securely, on board some of the vessels under your command, and report, without delay, to this Department, the particular circumstances of such cases. Great complaints are made of the interruption and injury to our commerce, by privateers fitted out from Spanish ports. You will endeavor to obtain, from the Spanish authorities, a list of the vessels so commissioned, and ascertain how far they have been instructed to intercept our trade with Mexico and the Columbian republic, impressing upon them, that, according to the well settled rule of the law of nations, the United States will not consider any portion of coast upon the Gulf of Mexico as legally blockaded, except where a naval force is stationed, sufficient to carry into effect the blockading order or decree; and that this government does not admit the right or authority of Spain to interdict, or interrupt our commerce with any portion of the coast included within the Columbian republic or Mexican government, not actually blockaded by a competent force.

All the United States ships and vessels of war in the West Indies, of which a list is herewith enclosed, are placed under your command, and you will distribute them to such stations as shall appear to you best calculated to afford complete protection to our commerce, in which you will embrace the object of protecting the convoy of specie from Vera Cruz, and the Mexican coast, generally, to the United States. Keep one vessel, at least, upon this service, to be at or near Vera Cruz during the healthy season of the year, and to be relieved as occasion shall require, both for the convoy of trade, and to bring specie to the United States, confining the transportation to the United States only. You will be particularly watchful to preserve the health of the officers and crews under your command, and to guard, in every possible manner, against the unhealthiness of the climate, not permitting any intercourse with the shore where the yellow fever prevails, except in cases of absolute necessity. Wishing you good health, and a successful cruise,

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

SMITH THOMPSON.

Com. DAVID PORTER, commanding U. S. Naval Force, West Indies.

LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES RELATIVE TO THE SLAVE TRADE.

Resolution adopted by the House of Representatives, February 8th, 1823.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to enter upon and prosecute, from time to time, such negotiations, with the several maritime powers of Europe and America, as he may deem expedient for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade, and its ultimate denunciation as piracy, under the law of nations, by the consent of the civilized world.

An act to prohibit the carrying on the slave trade from the United States to any foreign place or country.
[Laws of the U. S., vol. 2, p. 388.]

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That no citizen or citizens of the United States, or foreigner, or any other person coming into, or residing within the same, shall, for himself or any other person whatsoever, either as master, factor, or owner, build, fit, equip, load, or otherwise to prepare any ship or vessel within any port or place of the said United States, nor shall cause any ship or vessel to sail from any port or place within the same, for the purpose of carrying on any trade or traffic in slaves, to any foreign country; or for the purpose of procuring, from any foreign kingdom, place, or country, the inhabitants of such kingdom, place, or country, to be transported to any foreign country, port, or place, whatever, to be sold or disposed of as slaves; and if any ship or vessel shall be so fitted out, as aforesaid, for the said purposes, or shall be caused to sail, so as aforesaid, every such ship or vessel, her tackle, furniture, apparel, and other appurtenances, shall be forfeited to the United States; and shall be liable to be seized, prosecuted, and condemned, in any of the circuit courts or district court for the district, where the said ship or vessel may be found and seized.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all and every person, so building, fitting out, equipping, loading, or otherwise preparing, or sending away, any ship or vessel, knowing, or intending that the same shall be employed in such trade or business, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, or any ways aiding or abetting therein, shall severally forfeit and pay the sum of two thousand dollars; one moiety thereof to the use of the United States, and the other moiety thereof to the use of him or her who shall sue for and prosecute the same.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the owner, master, or factor, of each and every foreign ship or vessel, clearing out for any of the coasts or kingdoms of Africa, or suspected to be intended for the slave trade, and the suspicion being declared to the officer of the customs, by any citizen, on oath or affirmation, and such information being to the satisfaction of the said officer, shall first give bond, with sufficient sureties, to the Treasurer of the United States, that none of the natives of Africa, or any other foreign country or place, shall be taken on board the said ship or vessel, to be transported or sold as slaves, in any other foreign port or place whatever, within nine months thereafter.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any citizen or citizens of the United States shall, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, take on board, receive or transport any such persons, as above described in this act, for the purpose of selling them as slaves, as aforesaid, he or they shall forfeit and pay, for each and every person so received on board, transported, or sold as aforesaid, the sum of two hundred dollars, to be recovered in any court of the United States proper to try the same; and one moiety thereof to the use of the United States, and the other moiety to the use of such person or persons who shall sue for and prosecute the same.

Approved March 22, 1794.

An act in addition to the act entitled "An act to prohibit the carrying on the slave trade from the United States to any foreign place or country." [Laws U. S., vol. 3, p. 382.]

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That it shall be unlawful for any citizen of the United States, or other person residing within the United States, directly or indirectly to hold or have any right or property in any vessel employed or made use of in the transportation or carrying of slaves from one foreign country or place to another, and any right or property, belonging as aforesaid, shall be forfeited, and may be libeled and condemned for the use of the person who shall sue for the same; and such person, transgressing the prohibition aforesaid, shall also forfeit and pay a sum of money equal to double the value of the right or property in such vessel, which he held as aforesaid; and shall also forfeit a sum of money equal to double the value of the interest which he may have had in the slaves, which at any time may have been transported or carried in such vessel, after the passing of this act, and against the form thereof.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be unlawful for any citizen of the United States, or other person residing therein, to serve on board any vessel of the United States employed or made use of in the transportation or carrying of slaves from one foreign country or place to another; and any such citizen or other person, voluntarily serving as aforesaid, shall be liable to be indicted therefor, and on conviction thereof, shall be liable to a fine not exceeding two thousand dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding two years.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any citizen of the United States shall voluntarily serve on board of any foreign ship or vessel, which shall hereafter be employed in the slave trade, he shall, on conviction thereof, be liable to, and suffer the like forfeitures, pains, disabilities and penalties as he would have incurred, had such ship or vessel been owned or employed, in whole or in part, by any person or persons residing within the United States.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any of the commissioned vessels of the United States, to seize and take any vessel employed in carrying on trade, business, or traffic, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this or the said act to which this is in addition; and such vessel, together with her tackle, apparel and guns, and the goods or effects, other than slaves, which shall be found on board, shall be forfeited, and may be proceeded against in any of the district or circuit courts, and shall be condemned for the use of the officers and crew of the vessel making the seizure, and be divided in the proportion directed in the case of prize. And all persons interested in such vessel, or in the enterprise or voyage in which such vessel shall be employed at the time of such capture, shall be precluded from all right or claim to the slaves found on board such vessel as aforesaid, and from all damages or retribution on account thereof: and it shall moreover be the duty of the commanders of such commissioned vessels, to apprehend and take into custody every person found on board of such vessel so seized and taken, being of the officers or crew thereof, and him or them convey, as soon as conveniently may be, to the civil authority of the United States, in some one of the districts thereof, to be proceeded against in due course of law.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the district and circuit courts of the United States shall have cognizance of all acts and offences against the prohibitions herein contained.

SEC. 6. Provided, nevertheless, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to authorize the bringing into either of the United States, any person or persons, the importation of whom is, by the existing laws of such State, prohibited.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the forfeitures which shall hereafter be incurred under this, or the said act to which this is an addition, not otherwise disposed of, shall accrue and be one moiety thereof to the use of the informer, and the other moiety to the use of the United States, except where the prosecution shall be first instituted on behalf of the United States, in which case the whole shall be to their use.

Approved May 10, 1800.

An act to prevent the importation of certain persons into certain States, where, by the laws thereof, their admission is prohibited. [Laws U. S., vol. 2, p. 529.]

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That from and after the first day of April next, no master or captain of any ship or vessel, or any other person, shall import or bring, or cause to be imported or brought, any negro, mulatto, or other person of color, not being a native, a citizen, or registered seaman of the United States, or seamen, natives of countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope, into any port or place of the United States, which port or place shall be situated in any State which by law has prohibited or shall prohibit the admission or importation of such negro, mulatto, or other person of color; and if any captain or master aforesaid, or any other person, shall import or bring, or cause to be imported or brought into any of the ports or places aforesaid, any of the persons whose admission or importation is prohibited, as aforesaid, he shall forfeit and pay the sum of one thousand dollars for each and every negro, mulatto or other person of color aforesaid, brought or imported as aforesaid, to be sued for and recovered by action of debt, in any court of the United States; one-half thereof to the use of the United States, the other half to any person or persons prosecuting for the penalty; and in any action instituted for the recovery of the penalty aforesaid, the person or persons sued may be held to special bail: Provided, always, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to prohibit the admission of Indians.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no ship or vessel arriving in any of the said ports or places of the United States, and having on board any negro, mulatto, or other person of color, not being a native, a citizen, or registered seaman of the United States, or seamen, natives of countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope as aforesaid, shall be admitted to an entry. And if any such negro, mulatto, or other person of color, shall be landed from on board any ship or vessel, in any of the ports or places aforesaid, or on the coast of any state prohibiting the admission or importation, as aforesaid, the said ship or vessel, together with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be forfeited to the United States, and one-half of the net proceeds of the sales on such forfeiture, shall inure and be paid over to such person or persons on whose information the seizure on such forfeiture shall be made.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the collectors and other officers of the customs, and all other officers of the revenue of the United States, in the several ports or places situated as aforesaid, to notice and be governed by the provisions of the laws now existing, of the several States prohibiting the admission or importation of any negro, mulatto, or other person of color, as aforesaid. And they are hereby enjoined vigilantly to carry into effect the said laws of said States, conformably to the provisions of this act; any law of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

Approved February 28, 1803.

An act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eight. [Laws U. S., vol. 4, p. 94.]

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That from and after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eight, it shall not be lawful to import or bring into the United States, or the Territories thereof, from any foreign kingdom, place, or country, any negro, mulatto, or person of color, with intent to hold, sell, or dispose of such negro, mulatto, or person of color, as a slave, or to be held to service or labor.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no citizen or citizens of the United States, or any other person, shall, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eight, for himself or themselves, or any person whatsoever, either as master, factor, or owner, build, fit, equip, load, or otherwise prepare any ship or vessel, in any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, nor shall cause any ship or vessel to sail from any port or place within the same, for the purpose of procuring any negro, mulatto, or person of color, from any foreign kingdom, place, or country, to be transported to any port or place whatsoever, within the jurisdiction of the United States, to be held, sold, or disposed of as slaves, or to be held to service or labor; and if any ship or vessel shall be so fitted out for the purpose aforesaid, or shall be caused to sail so as aforesaid, every such ship or vessel, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be forfeited to the United States, and shall be liable to be seized, prosecuted, and condemned in any of the circuit courts or district courts for the district where the said ship or vessel may be found or seized.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all and every person so building, fitting out, equipping, loading, or otherwise preparing, or sending away, any ship or vessel, knowing or intending that the same shall be employed in such trade or business, from and after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eight, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, or any ways aiding or abetting therein, shall severally forfeit and pay twenty thousand dollars; one moiety thereof to the use of the United States, and the other moiety to the use of any person or persons who shall sue for and prosecute the same to effect.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, If any citizen or citizens of the United States, or any person resident within the jurisdiction of the same, shall, from and after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eight, take on board, receive, or transport from any of the coasts or kingdoms of Africa, or from any other foreign kingdom, place, or country, any negro, mulatto, or person of color, in any ship or vessel, for the purpose of selling them in any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, as slaves, or to be held to service or labor, or shall be in any ways aiding or abetting therein, such citizen or citizens, or person, shall severally forfeit and pay five thousand dollars; one moiety thereof to the use of any persons who shall sue for and prosecute the same to effect. And every such ship or vessel in which such negro, mulatto, or person of color, shall have been taken on board, received, or transported, as aforesaid, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the goods and effects which shall be found on board the same, shall be forfeited to the United States, and shall be liable to be seized, prosecuted and condemned, in any of the circuit courts or district courts in the district where the said ship or vessel may be found or seized. And neither the importer, nor any person or persons claiming from or under him, shall hold any right or title whatsoever to any negro, mulatto, or person of color, nor to the service or labor thereof, who may be imported or brought within the United States, or Territories thereof, in violation of this law, but the same shall remain subject to any regulations not contravening the provisions of this act, which the legislatures of the several States or Territories at any time hereafter may make, for disposing of any such negro, mulatto, or person of color.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any citizen or citizens of the United States, or any other person resident within the jurisdiction of the same, shall, from and after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eight, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, take on board any ship or vessel from any of the coasts or kingdoms of Africa, or from any other foreign kingdom, place, or country, any negro, mulatto, or person of color, with intent to sell him, her, or them, for a slave, or slaves, or to be held to service or labor, and shall transport the same to any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, and there sell such negro, mulatto, or person of color, so transported as aforesaid, for a slave, or to be held to service or labor, every such offender shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and being thereof convicted before any court having competent jurisdiction, shall suffer imprisonment for not more than ten years, nor less than five years, and be fined not exceeding ten thousand dollars, nor less than one thousand dollars.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons whatsoever, shall, from and after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eight, purchase or sell any negro, mulatto, or person of color, for a slave, or to be held to service or labor, who shall have been imported, or brought from any foreign kingdom, place, or country, or from the dominions of any foreign State, immediately adjoining to the United States, into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, after the last day of December, one thousand eight hundred and seven, knowing at the time of such purchase or sale, such negro, mulatto, or person of color, was so brought within the jurisdiction of the United States, as aforesaid, such purchaser or seller shall severally forfeit and pay for every negro, mulatto, or person of color, so purchased or sold as aforesaid, eight hundred dollars; one moiety thereof to the United States, and the other moiety to the use of any person or persons who shall sue for and prosecute the same to effect: Provided, That the aforesaid forfeiture shall not extend to the seller, or purchaser of any negro, mulatto, or person of color, who may be sold or disposed of in virtue of any regulation which may hereafter be made by any of the legislatures of the several States in that respect, in pursuance of this act, and the Constitution of the United States.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That if any ship or vessel shall be found, from and after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eight, in any river, port, bay or harbor, or on the high seas within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, or hovering on the coast thereof, having on board any negro, mulatto, or person of color, for the purpose of selling them as slaves, or with intent to land the same, in any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, contrary to the prohibition of this act, every such ship or vessel, together with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the goods or effects which shall be found on board the same, shall be forfeited to the use of the United States, and may be seized, prosecuted, and condemned, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof. And it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, and he is hereby authorized, should he deem it expedient, to cause any of the armed vessels of the United States to be manned and employed to cruise on any part of the coast of the United States, or Territories thereof, where he may judge attempts will be made to violate the provisions of this act, and to instruct and direct the commanders of armed vessels of the United States, to seize, take, and bring into any port of the United States, all such ships or vessels, and moreover to seize, take, and bring into any port of the United States, all ships or vessels of the United States, wheresoever found on the high seas, contravening the provisions of this act, to be proceeded against according to law; and the captain, master, or commander of every such ship or vessel, so found and seized as aforesaid, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be liable to be prosecuted before any court of the United States, having jurisdiction thereof; and being thereof convicted, shall be fined not exceeding ten thousand dollars, and be imprisoned not less than two years, and not exceeding four years. And the proceeds of all ships and vessels, their tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the goods and effects on board of them, which shall be so seized, prosecuted and condemned, shall be divided equally between the United States and the officers and men who shall make such seizure, take, or bring the same into port for condemnation, whether such seizure be made by an armed vessel of the United States, or revenue cutters thereof, and the same shall be distributed in like manner as is provided by law for the distribution of prizes taken from an enemy: Provided, That the officers and men to be entitled to one-half of the proceeds aforesaid, shall safe keep every negro, mulatto, or person of color, found on board of any ship or vessel so by them seized, taken, or brought into port for condemnation, and shall deliver every such negro, mulatto, or person of color, to such person or persons as shall be appointed by the respective States to receive the same; and if no such person or persons shall be appointed by the respective States, they shall deliver every such negro, mulatto, or person of color, to the overseers of the poor of the port or place where such ship or vessel may be brought and found, and shall immediately transmit to the governor, or chief magistrate of the State, an account of their proceedings, together with the number of such negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, and a descriptive list of the same, that he may give directions respecting such negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That no captain, master, or commander of any ship or vessel, of less burthen than forty tons, shall, from and after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eight, take on board and transport any negro, mulatto, or person of color, to any port or place whatsoever, for the purpose of selling or disposing of the same as a slave, or with intent that the same may be sold or disposed of to be held to service or labor, on penalty of forfeiting for every such negro, mulatto, or person of color, so taken on board and transported as aforesaid, the sum of eight hundred dollars; one moiety thereof to the use of the United States, and the other moiety to any person or persons who shall sue for and prosecute the same to effect: Provided, however, That nothing in this section shall extend to prohibit the taking on board or transporting on any river, or inland bay of the sea, within the jurisdiction of the United States, any negro, mulatto, or person of color, (not imported contrary to the provisions of this act,) in any vessel or species of craft whatever.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the captain, master, or commander of any ship or vessel of the burthen of forty tons or more, from and after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eight, sailing coastwise from any port in the United States to any port or place within the jurisdiction of the same, having on board any negro, mulatto, or person of color, for the purpose of transporting them to be sold or disposed of as slaves, or to be held to service or labor, shall, previous to the departure of such ship or vessel, make out and subscribe duplicate manifests of every such negro, mulatto, or person of color, on board such ship or vessel, therein specifying the name and sex of each person, their age and stature, as near as may be, and the class to which they respectively belong, whether negro, mulatto, or person of color, with the name and place of residence of every owner, or shipper of the same, and shall deliver such manifests to the collector of the port, if there be one, otherwise to the surveyor, before whom the captain, master, or commander, together with the owner, or shipper, shall severally swear or affirm, to the best of their knowledge and belief, that the persons therein specified were not imported or brought into the United States from and after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eight, and that under the laws of the State, they are held to service or labor; whereupon the said collector or surveyor, shall certify the same on the said manifests, one of which he shall return to the said captain, master, or commander, with a permit, specifying thereon the number, names, and general description of such persons, and authorizing him to proceed to the port of his destination. And if any ship or vessel, being laden or destined as aforesaid, shall depart from the port where she may then be, without the captain, master, or commander having first made out and subscribed duplicate manifests, of every negro, mulatto and person of color, on board such ship or vessel, as aforesaid, and without having previously delivered the same to the said collector, or surveyor, and obtained a permit, in manner as herein required, or shall, previous to her arrival at the port of destination, take on board any negro, mulatto, or person of color, other than those specified in the manifests, as aforesaid, every such ship or vessel, together with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be forfeited to the use of the United States, and may be seized, prosecuted, and condemned, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof; and the captain, master, or commander of every ship or vessel, shall moreover forfeit, for every such negro, mulatto, or person of color, so transported, or taken on board, contrary to the provisions of this act, the sum of one thousand dollars; one moiety thereof to the United States, and the other moiety to the use of any person or persons who shall sue for and prosecute the same to effect.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the captain, master, or commander of every ship or vessel, of the burthen of forty tons or more, from and after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eight, sailing coastwise, and having on board any negro, mulatto, or person of color, to sell or dispose of as slaves, or to be held to service or labor, and arriving in any port within the jurisdiction of the United States, from any other port within the same, shall, previous to the unlading or putting on shore any of the persons aforesaid, or suffering them to go on shore, deliver to the collector, if there be one, or, if not, to the surveyor residing at the port of her arrival, the manifest certified by the collector or surveyor of the port from whence she sailed, as is hereinbefore directed, to the truth of which, before such officer, he shall swear or affirm; and if the collector or surveyor shall be satisfied therewith, he shall thereupon grant a permit for unlading, or suffering such negro, mulatto, or person of color to be put on shore; and, if the captain, master, or commander of any such ship or vessel, being laden as aforesaid, shall neglect or refuse to deliver the manifest at the time and in the manner herein directed, or shall land or put on shore any negro, mulatto, or person of color, for the purpose aforesaid, before he shall have delivered his manifest as aforesaid, and obtained a permit for that purpose, every such captain, master, or commander shall forfeit and pay ten thousand dollars, one moiety thereof to the United States, the other moiety to the use of any person or persons who shall sue for and prosecute the same to effect.

Approved March 2, 1807.

An act in addition to "An act to prohibit the introduction (importation) of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eight," and to repeal certain parts of the same. [Laws United States, vol. 6, p. 325.]

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That, from and after the passage of this act, it shall not be lawful to import or bring, in any manner whatsoever, into the United States, or Territories thereof, from any foreign kingdom, place, or country, any negro, mulatto, or person of color, with intent to hold, sell, or dispose of any such negro, mulatto, or person of color as a slave, or to be held to service or labor; and any ship, vessel, or other water craft employed in any importation as aforesaid, shall be liable to seizure, prosecution, and forfeiture in any district in which it may be found; one-half thereof to the use of the United States, and the other half to the use of him or them who shall prosecute the same to effect.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no citizen or citizens of the United States, or any other person or persons, shall, after the passing of this act, as aforesaid, for himself, themselves, or any other person or persons whatsoever, either as master, factor or owner, build, fit, equip, load, or otherwise prepare, any ship or vessel, in any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, nor cause any such ship or vessel to sail from any port or place whatsoever, within the jurisdiction of the same, for the purpose of procuring any negro, mulatto, or person of color from any foreign kingdom, place, or country, to be transported to any port or place whatsoever, to be held, sold, or otherwise disposed of as slaves, or to be held to service or labor; and if any ship or vessel shall be so built, fitted out, equipped, laden or otherwise prepared for the purpose aforesaid, every such ship or vessel, her tackle, apparel, furniture, and lading, shall be forfeited; one moiety to the use of the United States, and the other to the use of the person or persons who shall sue for said forfeiture and prosecute the same to effect; and such ship or vessel shall be liable to be seized, prosecuted, and condemned in any court of the United States having competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That every person or persons so building, fitting out, equipping, loading, or otherwise preparing, or sending away, or causing any of the acts aforesaid to be done, with intent to employ such ship or vessel in such trade or business, after the passing of this act, contrary to the true intent and meaning thereof, or who shall, in anywise, be aiding or abetting therein, shall, severally, on conviction thereof by due course of law, forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding five thousand dollars, nor less than one thousand dollars; one moiety to the use of the United States, and the other to the use of the person or persons who shall sue for such forfeiture, and prosecute the same with effect, and shall moreover be imprisoned for a term not exceeding seven years, nor less than three years.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any citizen or citizens of the United States, or other person or persons resident within the jurisdiction of the same, shall, from and after the passing of this act, take on board, receive, or transport from any of the coasts or kingdoms of Africa, or from any other foreign kingdom, place, or country, or from sea, any negro, mulatto, or person of color, not being an inhabitant, nor held to service by the laws of either of the States or Territories of the United States, in any ship, vessel, boat, or other water craft, for the purpose of holding, selling, or otherwise disposing of, such person as a slave, or to be held to service or labor, or be aiding or abetting therein, every such person or persons so offending shall, on conviction by due course of law, severally forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding five thousand nor less than one thousand dollars, one moiety to the use of the United States, and the other to the use of the person or persons who shall sue for such forfeiture and prosecute the same to effect, and, moreover, shall suffer imprisonment for a term not exceeding seven years, nor less than three years; and every ship or vessel, boat, or other water craft on which such negro, mulatto, or person of color shall have been taken on board, received, or transported as aforesaid, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the goods and effects which shall be found on board the same, or shall have been imported therein in the same voyage, shall be forfeited, one moiety to the use of the United States, and the other to the use of the person or persons who shall sue for and prosecute the same to effect; and every such ship or vessel shall be liable to be seized, prosecuted, and condemned in any court of the United States having competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That neither the importer nor importers, nor any person or persons claiming from or under him or them, shall hold any right, interest, or title whatsoever, in or to any negro, mulatto, or person of color, nor to the service or labor thereof, who may be imported or brought into the United States or the Territories thereof, in violation of the provisions of this act, but the same shall remain subject to any regulations, not contravening said provisions, which the legislatures of the several States or Territories may at any time heretofore have made, or hereafter may make, for disposing of any such negro, mulatto, or person of color.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons whatsoever shall, from and after the passing of this act, bring within the jurisdiction of the United States, in any manner whatsoever, any negro, mulatto, or person of color from any foreign kingdom, place, or country, or from sea, or shall hold, sell, or otherwise dispose of, any such negro, mulatto, or person of color, so brought in, as a slave, or to be held to service or labor, or be in anywise aiding or abetting therein, every person so offending shall, on conviction thereof by due course of law, forfeit and pay, for every such offence, a sum not exceeding ten thousand nor less than one thousand dollars, one moiety to the use of the United States, and the other to the use of the person or persons who shall sue for such forfeiture, and prosecute the same to effect; and, moreover, shall suffer imprisonment, for a term not exceeding seven years, nor less than three years.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons whatsoever shall hold, purchase, sell, or otherwise dispose of, any negro, mulatto, or person of color, for a slave, or to be held to service or labor, who shall have been imported or brought, in any way, from any foreign kingdom, place, or country, or from the dominions of any foreign State immediately adjoining to the United States, into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the passing of this act, every person so offending, and every person aiding or abetting therein, shall severally forfeit and pay, for every negro, mulatto, or person of color, so held, purchased, sold, or disposed of, one thousand dollars; one moiety to the use of the United States, and the other to the use of the person or persons who may sue for such forfeiture, and prosecute the same to effect, and to stand committed until the said forfeiture be paid: Provided, That the aforesaid forfeiture shall not extend to the seller or purchaser of any negro, mulatto, or person of color, who may be sold or disposed of in virtue of any regulations which have been heretofore, or shall hereafter be, lawfully made by any legislature of any State or Territory, in pursuance of this act and the Constitution of the United States.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That in all prosecutions under this act, the defendant or defendants shall be holden to prove that the negro, mulatto, or person of color, which he or they shall be charged with having brought into the United States, or with purchasing, holding, selling, or otherwise disposing of, and which, according to the evidence in such case, the said defendant or defendants shall have brought in aforesaid, or otherwise disposed of, was brought into the United States at least five years previous to the commencement of such prosecution, or was not brought in, holden, purchased, or otherwise disposed of, contrary to the provisions of this act; and on failure thereof, the said defendant or defendants shall be judged guilty of the offence of which he or they may stand accused.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That any prosecution, information, or action, may be sustained, for any offence under this act, at any time within five years after such offence shall have been committed; any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the first six sections of the act to which this is an addition, shall be and the same are hereby repealed: Provided, That all offences committed under the said sections of the act aforesaid, before the passing of this act, shall be prosecuted and punished, and any forfeitures which have been incurred under the same shall be recovered and distributed as if this act had not been passed.

Approved April 20, 1818.

An act in addition to the acts prohibiting the slave trade. [Laws U. S., vol. 6, p. 435.]

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, whenever he shall deem it expedient, to cause any of the armed vessels of the United States to be employed to cruise on any of the coasts of the United States, or Territories thereof, or of the coast of Africa, or elsewhere, where he may judge attempts may be made to carry on the slave trade by citizens or residents of the United States, in contravention of the acts of Congress prohibiting the same, and to instruct and direct the commanders of all armed vessels of the United States, to seize, take, and bring into any port of the United States, all ships or vessels of the United States, wheresoever found, which may have taken on board, or which may be intended for the purpose of taking on board, or of transporting, or may have transported, any negro, mulatto, or person of color, in violation of any of the provisions of the act, entitled "An act in addition to an act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eight, and to repeal certain parts of the same," or of any other act or acts prohibiting the traffic in slaves, to be proceeded against according to law: and the proceeds of all ships and vessels, their tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the goods and effects on board of them, which shall be so seized, prosecuted, and condemned, shall be divided equally between the United States and the officers and men who shall seize, take or bring, the same into port for condemnation, whether such seizure be made by an armed vessel of the United States or revenue cutter thereof: and the same shall be distributed in like manner as is provided by law for the distribution of prizes taken from an enemy: Provided, That the officers and men, to be entitled to one-half of the proceeds aforesaid, shall safe keep every negro, mulatto, or person of color, found on board of any ship or vessel so seized, taken, or brought into port for condemnation, and shall deliver every such negro, mulatto, or person of color, to the marshal of the district into which they are brought, if into a port of the United States, or, if elsewhere, to such person or persons as shall be lawfully appointed by the President of the United States, in the manner hereinafter directed, transmitting to the President of the United States, as soon as may be after delivery, a descriptive list of such negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, that he may give directions for the disposal of them. And provided further, That the commanders of such commissioned vessels, do cause to be apprehended, and taken into custody, every person found on board of such vessel, so seized and taken, being of the officers or crew thereof, and him or them convey, as soon as conveniently may be, to the civil authority of the United States, to be proceeded against, in due course of law, in some of the districts thereof.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby authorized, to make such regulations and arrangements, as he may deem expedient, for the safe keeping, support, and removal beyond the limits of the United States, of all such negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, as may be so delivered and brought within their jurisdiction: and to appoint a proper person or persons, residing upon the coast of Africa, as agent or agents for receiving the negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, delivered from on board vessels, seized in the prosecution of the slave trade, by commanders of the United States armed vessels.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That a bounty of twenty-five dollars be paid to the officers and crews of the commissioned vessels of the United States, or revenue cutters, for each and every negro, mulatto, or person of color, who shall have been, as hereinbefore provided, delivered to the marshal or agent duly appointed to receive them; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to pay, or cause to be paid, to such officers and crews, or their agent, the aforesaid bounty, for each person delivered as aforesaid.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That when any citizen, or other person, shall lodge information, with the attorney for the district of any State or Territory, as the case may be, that any negro, mulatto, or person of color, has been imported therein, contrary to the provisions of the acts in such case made and provided, it shall be the duty of the said attorney forthwith to commence a prosecution by information; and process shall issue against the person charged with holding such negro, negroes, mulatto, mulattoes, person or persons of color, so alleged to be imported contrary to the provisions of the acts aforesaid: And if, upon the return of the process executed, it shall be ascertained, by the verdict of a jury, that such negro, negroes, mulatto, mulattoes, person or persons of color, have been brought in, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the acts in such cases made and provided, then the court shall direct the marshal of the said district to take the said negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, into his custody, for safe keeping, subject to the orders of the President of the United States: and the informer or informers, who shall have lodged the information, shall be entitled to receive, over and above the portion of the penalties accruing to him or them by the provisions of the acts in such case made and provided, a bounty of fifty dollars, for each and every negro, mulatto, or person of color, who shall have been delivered into the custody of the marshal; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to pay, or cause to be paid, the aforesaid bounty, upon the certificate of the clerk of the court for the district where the prosecution may have been had, with the seal of office thereto annexed, stating the number of negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, so delivered.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the commander of any armed vessel of the United States, whenever he shall make any capture under the provisions of this act, to bring the vessel and her cargo, for adjudication, into some of the ports of the State or Territory to which such vessel, so captured, shall belong, if he can ascertain the same; if not, then to be sent into any convenient port of the United States.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That all such acts, or parts of acts, as may be repugnant to the provisions of this act, shall be, and the same are hereby repealed.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That a sum not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to carry this law into effect.

Approved March 3, 1819.

An act to continue in force "An act to protect the commerce of the United States and punish the crime of piracy," and also to make further provision for punishing the crime of piracy. [Laws United States, vol. 6, p. 529.]

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the first, second, third, and fourth, sections of an act, entitled "An act to protect the commerce of the United States and punish the crime of piracy," passed on the third day of March, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, be, and the same are hereby, continued in force, from the passing of this act for the term of two years, and from thence to the end of the next session of Congress, and no longer.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the fifth section of the said act be, and the same is hereby, continued in force, as to all crimes made punishable by the same, and heretofore committed, in all respects, as fully as if the duration of the said section had been without limitation.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall, upon the high seas, or in any open roadstead, or in any haven, basin, or bay, or in any river where the sea ebbs and flows, commit the crime of robbery, in or upon any ship or vessel, or upon any of the ship's company, of any ship or vessel, or the lading thereof, such person shall be adjudged to be a pirate; and, being thereof convicted, before the circuit court of the United States for the district into which he shall be brought, or in which he shall be found, shall suffer death. And if any person engaged in any piratical cruise or enterprise, or being of the crew or ship's company of any piratical ship or vessel, shall land from such ship or vessel, and, on shore, shall commit robbery, such person shall be adjudged a pirate; and, on conviction thereof, before the circuit court of the United States for the district into which he shall be brought, or in which he shall be found, shall suffer death: Provided, That nothing in this section contained shall be construed to deprive any particular State of its jurisdiction over such offences, when committed within the body of a county, or authorize the courts of the United States to try any such offenders, after conviction or acquittance, for the same offence, in a State court.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any citizen of the United States, being of the crew or ship's company of any foreign ship or vessel engaged in the slave trade, or any person whatever, being of the crew or ship's company of any ship or vessel, owned in the whole or part, or navigated for, or in behalf of, any citizen or citizens of the United States, shall land, from any such ship or vessel, and, on any foreign shore, seize any negro or mulatto, not held to service or labor by the laws of either of the States or Territories of the United States, with intent to make such negro or mulatto a slave, or shall decoy, or forcibly bring or carry, or shall receive, such negro or mulatto on board any such ship or vessel, with intent as aforesaid, such citizen or person shall be adjudged a pirate: and, on conviction thereof, before the circuit court of the United States for the district wherein he may be brought or found, shall suffer death.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any citizen of the United States, being of the crew or ship's company of any foreign ship or vessel engaged in the slave trade, or any person whatever, being of the crew or ship's company of any ship or vessel, owned wholly or in part, or navigated for, or in behalf of, any citizen or citizens of the United States, shall forcibly confine or detain, or aid and abet in forcibly confining or detaining, or board such ship or vessel, any negro or mulatto not held to service by the laws of either of the States or Territories of the United States, with intent to make such negro or mulatto a slave, or shall, on board any such ship or vessel, offer or attempt to sell, as a slave, any negro or mulatto not held to service as aforesaid, or shall, on the high seas, or anywhere on tide water, transfer or deliver over, to any other ship or vessel, any negro or mulatto, not held to service as aforesaid, with intent to make such negro or mulatto a slave, or shall land, or deliver or shore, from on board any such ship or vessel, any such negro or mulatto, with intent to make sale of, or having previously sold such negro or mulatto, as a slave, such citizen or person shall be adjudged a pirate; and, on conviction thereof, before the circuit court of the United States for the district wherein he shall be brought or found, shall suffer death.

Copy of general instructions, for officers commanding cruising vessels.

NAVY DEPARTMENT.

SIR: Enclosed you have a copy of an act of Congress, by which you will perceive that a high and delicate power is vested in the President, in authorizing him to employ our public armed ships in protecting the merchant vessels of the United States and their crews, from piratical aggressions and depredations. It will readily occur to you, that, considering the situation in which we stand in relation to Spain and the South American colonies, the authority given under this act, must be exercised with the utmost caution and prudence by our public vessels. You have the whole act laid before you, that you may see its general scope and object; but you will observe that the execution of the law is under the direction of the President, so far as respects the employment of our public vessels. Your conduct will therefore be regulated by your instructions, although they may not go to the full length the law might possibly warrant.

Under the second section of the act, authority is given to subdue, seize, take, and send into any port of the United States, any armed vessel or boat, or any vessel or boat, the crew whereof shall be armed, and which shall have attempted or committed any piratical aggression, search, restraint, depredation, or seizure, upon any vessel of the United States, or of the citizens thereof, or upon any other vessels.

From the generality of this latter description of vessels, it would seem to embrace those of every nation or country upon which any piratical aggressions may have been committed. Admitting the act might be extended thus far, it does not appear to have been the general object of the law; and it is thought by the President most advisable, at present, not to give it a like indiscriminate practical construction as to all vessels. The great object, as pointed out in the first section of the act, was to protect the merchant vessels of the United States and their crews from piratical aggressions. This will, therefore, be considered your particular and special duty. If, however, you shall discover depredations upon other vessels, committed under such gross and aggravated circumstances, as to leave little doubt of their piratical character, it will be your duty to capture and bring in the aggressors. It is thought most advisable thus to distinguish in your instructions, because, among other considerations, it will be seen, that, under the second section of the act, you are only authorized to retake vessels of the United States or its citizens, which may have been unlawfully captured upon the high seas. No authority is given to retake the vessels of any foreign nation or country.

You will also perceive, under this second section of the act, authority is only given to subdue, seize and take such vessels or boats, &c., as shall have attempted or committed some piratical aggression. Whatever well grounded suspicions you may entertain, that a vessel may have been fitted out, and is intended to be employed in such depredations, you will not molest her, unless you have satisfactory evidence that she has either attempted or actually committed some piratical aggression on some merchant vessel of the United States, or her crew, or upon some other vessel, under the special circumstances above mentioned. This is to be considered an important and leading regulation in your conduct, as it will be a strong and almost controlling circumstance (considering we are at peace with all the world), in making up your judgment, whether you are safe and justifiable in treating them as pirates. Whenever, therefore, you shall find any boats or vessels the crews whereof have committed any actual violence, outrage or depredation, upon any vessels of the United States, or the citizens thereof, or any other vessels, as above mentioned, you will consider yourself authorized to subdue, seize and take them; and, unless on such capture you shall be satisfied that they were acting under some lawful authority, and not piratically, to send them in for adjudication.

The range of your cruise will be along the coast of the United States and the Floridas, in the Gulf of Mexico and among the West India islands; changing your position in such manner as shall best answer the object of your cruise, touching at such ports and places as may be necessary and proper to procure supplies, and to obtain information, the better to enable you to carry into effect the objects contemplated in the act of Congress. Great reliance is placed on your prudence and sound discretion, that you will so execute the power entrusted to you as to protect the commerce of the United States, without infringing the lawful rights of any other nation or country, their citizens or subjects. All captures made by you, will be sent into one of the following ports: Boston, New York, Norfolk, Charleston, Savannah, or New Orleans.

You have, also, enclosed, such parts of several acts of Congress prohibiting the importation of slaves into any ports or places within the jurisdiction of the United States, as are necessary to point out to you your duty and authority under these laws; and it is expected and required of you, by the President, that a strict and vigilant attention be paid to the direction therein contained; that, if possible, this inhuman and disgraceful traffic may be suppressed.

By the act of the 20th April, 1818, you will perceive that it is made unlawful to import or bring, in any manner whatsoever, into the United States or Territories thereof, from any foreign kingdom, place or country, any negro, mulatto, or person of color, with intent to hold, sell or dispose of such person as a slave, or to be held to service. By this act it is also made unlawful for any citizen of the United States, or other person, to build, equip, load, fit, or otherwise prepare, any ship or vessel in any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, or to cause any such ship or vessel to sail from any port or place whatsoever, within the jurisdiction of the United States, for the purpose of procuring and transporting any such slaves to any port or place whatever. And any ship or vessel employed in such importation of slaves, or so built, fitted out, or prepared, is liable to be seized and forfeited.

And by the act of the 3d March, 1819, the President is authorized to employ any of the armed vessels of the United States to cruise in such places as he may think proper, where he may judge attempts may be made to carry on the slave trade, by citizens of the United States, or residents thereof, in contravention of the acts of Congress prohibiting the same; and to instruct such armed vessels to seize, take, and bring into any port of the United States, to be proceeded against according to law, all ships or vessels of the United States, wheresoever found, which may have taken on board, or which may be intended for the purpose of taking on board, or of transporting, or may have transported, any negro, mulatto, or person of color, in violation of any of the provisions of the act of the 20th April, 1818, above referred to, or in violation of any other act or acts prohibiting the traffic in slaves.

You will perceive from the generality of the provisions in these laws, you are authorized to take and bring in all ships or vessels of the United States, which may have been in any manner employed, or intended to be employed in the slave trade; or any other vessel offending against the provisions of any of the laws you have enclosed. You will particularly notice, the two provisos to the first section of the act of 1819, the first of which directs in what manner you are to keep and dispose of the slaves which may be found on board of any ship or vessel seized by you. If brought within the United States, they are to be delivered to the marshal of the district where brought in; and transmit the evidence of such delivery to this Department. It is the wish of the President, however, that none should be brought into the United States. Upon the capture, therefore, of any vessel having slaves on board, you will immediately proceed to the Island of Sherbro, on the coast of Africa, and deliver such slaves to the agent appointed by the President to receive them, pursuant to the provisions of the act, or to any other agent, so appointed, at any other place on the coast of Africa. The second proviso relates to the disposition of the officers and crews of such vessels so captured by you. Great vigilance will be expected from you in the safe keeping of all such officers and crews, until they shall be handed over to the civil authority to be proceeded against according to law.

You will also observe, that by the fifth section of this act, it is made your duty to bring any vessel and her cargo, you may capture, into some of the ports of the State or Territory to which the captured vessel shall belong, if you can ascertain the same; if not, then into any convenient port of the United States.

The range of your cruising for this purpose, will be the same as that pointed out in the former part of your instructions, in relation to pirates.

I am, very respectfully, your most obedient servant.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, February 4, 1823.

SIR: Since you left here, it has been strongly urged to keep part of our naval force to windward, to watch the Spanish privateers, and particularly about Porto Rico, and thence to Laguira and Porto Cabello. I wish you to distribute a part of your force in that quarter.

I am, respectfully, &c.,

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 11, 1825.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 23, 1823,

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, bearing date Matanzas, 16th April, last; communicating the partial accomplishment of your arrangements for accommodation at Thompson's Island—the distribution of the force under your command—the gallant conduct of Lieutenant Stribling, in the capture of the pirate "Pilot," with a detachment from your squadron, without loss on his side, and your regret at the necessity which has compelled you, from the insufficiency of your number of men, to lay up the Peacock; thereby preventing you from giving to your plan of operations, the extension and activity at first contemplated. Great satisfaction is felt at the prevalence of such general health in your squadron; and hopes are entertained, that by its continuance, the important object you have in view will be more speedily and effectually obtained, and unattended likewise by any of those unfortunate concomitants incident to a climate peculiarly obnoxious, and a service somewhat oppressive.

Some relief, however, will be afforded to you, when the performance of the particular duties, assigned to the commanders of the John Adams and Enterprise, shall enable them to form a junction with your force, and place themselves, (as expressly instructed,) under your command. Instructions have been given to the commanders of those vessels to use all possible dispatch in the execution of their provieus orders, and report themselves to you for such service as may be assigned them, in aid of your general operations. By reference to their sailing orders, and general instructions, which they will present to you for examination, you will be more particularly informed of the extent of your authority over them, and can consequently assign to them that sphere of operation, which you may think best adapted to the promotion of the objects you have in view. The Spark is rapidly refitting, to be dispatched, when ready, to reinforce your squadron, and act under your command.

Whenever it is practicable to procure supplies for the squadron from this country—you will do so; as they can be furnished on terms more economical, and of a quality very superior. I enclose copy of a letter, addressed to Captain Patterson, in relation to his detention and employment of the schooner Grampus, which will give you my views upon the subject.

With great respect, &c.,
(Signed) SMITH THOMPSON.

Captain DAVID PORTER, commanding U. S. Naval Force, W. I. Station, Thompson's Island.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 11, 1825.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, June 7, 1823.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your leter of the 10th ultimo, in which you complain of the absence of those vessels of war of the United States, which you had supposed were to form a part of your squadron, and afford you assistance in the duties assigned you.

The supposition was correct; but it is scarcely possible to assign causes which will afford you any light upon this subject, except as they may relate to those vessels which have returned to the United States, and are now rapidly refitting to be sent out to your command.

The orders under which some of the commanders acted, being anterior in date to your appointment to the entire command, allowed a greater latitude of discretion than will be observed when they shall have united their respective commands with yours; and in the exercise of this power may probably be found the reasons of their absence. Your own examination of their orders, when you meet, will confirm or reject the above suggestion.

The vessels intended to be placed immediately and ultimately under your command, are comprised in the annexed list marked A, in which those designated by the letter B, in red, are the vessels now and lately in the United States, refitting for the West India service, where they will proceed, as soon as they shall have performed some indispensable, but temporary duties, which have been assigned them.

I also annex a list marked C, which gives the names of those lieutenants and midshipmen who have been ordered to report to you for duty, and to whom you will assign such parts thereof as, in your judgment, will best promote the interests of the service and the object to be attained.

Your force, when once united, will be amply sufficient for the accomplishment of your views, as well as the better accommodation of yourself and those under your command; and you will, no doubt, give it such distribution and arrangement as will unite these objects.

The vessels ordered to join you, (which are enumerated in paper A,) will enable you, in pursuing your first plan, to afford more adequate convoy to merchantmen, while the ability for examining and searching the coasts and inlets, for the lurking places of pirates, by means of the schooners and barges, will be greatly increased.

Every assistance which the Department can afford, consistently with its other relations, shall be cheerfully and promptly extended; and while a just expectation is indulged that, from the extent and character of the means afforded, the object contemplated will be speedily and satisfactorily realized, no doubt is entertained of the zeal and ability that will be exerted on the part of those entrusted with the performance.

Too much attention cannot be placed upon the cleanliness of the men, and the good condition of the vessels; for, to causes incident to every naval service in the generation of disease and mortality, are superadded the baneful influence of a tropical climate upon constitutions unaccustomed to its operations, and unprepared for its effects.

I refer you particularly to my letter of the 23d ult. for instructions in relation to the purchase of supplies, and the negotiation of drafts upon the Department.

I am, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

SMITH THOMPSON.

SIR: Your letter of the 1st instant, relative to the transportation of specie, from Vera Cruz to Cadiz, has been submitted to the President; and it would afford both him and myself great pleasure to comply with your request, could it be done consistently with the honor of the American flag, and the relation in which we stand to the belligerents.

Your letter is not explicit, as to whom the money belongs. I take it for granted, however, it is Spanish property, and from the amount, most likely belonging to the Spanish government. In either case, it is deemed inadmissible to employ our public armed vessels for its transportation; under no circumstances could it be permitted to send a vessel direct from Vera Cruz to Cadiz. Should I be under a misapprehension as to the ownership of the property, and, upon further explanation, your request can with propriety be complied with, I can assure you it will give me great satisfaction to promote your interest in this respect.

SIR: The United States schooner Weasel, under the command of Lieutenant John P. Zantzinger, will sail this day for Thompson's Island, and take the route pointed out in your orders to Lieutenant Kennon of the 14th August last. It was not possible to prepare her to sail at an earlier day. The Beagle will be ready in three or four days.

The schooner Shark, having on board Commodore Rodgers, and several surgeons, will leave New York about the 1st October, and reach Thompson's Island as soon as practicable. The uncertainty and anxiety which prevail as to your own health, and the health of the squadron, and a desire to furnish the best assistance and procure information which may be a safe guide on all future occasions, are the inducements to this measure. The orders of Commodore Rodgers will be communicated to you on his arrival, and you will render all the aid, which your health will permit, in accomplishing the object of his visit. It is intended that you shall remain in command of the station, or return home, as your health may require and inclination prompt. Commodore Rodgers will return immediately after he shall have accomplished the object of his visit.

It is wished that Midshipman Hoban should return in the first vessel from Thompson's Island to this place, some of his family being at this time very sick.

I am, very respectfully, &c.,

The Secretary of the Navy to Commodore Porter.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, September 29, 1823.

MY DEAR SIR: This letter will be handed to you by Commodore Rodgers. The object of his visit to Thompson's Island will be fully communicated to you by him. The various, and in many points contradictory, reports, respecting the condition of the station, the uncertainty whether you still live, the deepest anxiety for your safety, the desire to furnish speedy relief, and acquire full information respecting the health of the station, and its fitness as a rendezvous during the sickly season, and the fear that, debilitated as you are, you could not secure that information for us, have prompted the wish that Commodore Rodgers should undertake the expedition, and have induced him, cheerfully and voluntarily, to enter on its performance.

He will find united in it the sacred offices of private friendship and public duty. A report that your health is restored will give to me, individually, and to the nation at large, most sincere gratification.

I am, very respectfully, dear sir, your most obedient servant,
SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD.

Com. DAVID PORTER, commanding U. S. Naval Forces, West Indies and Gulf of Mexico.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, October 28, 1823.

SIR: Your letter of the 27th inst. has been received. On your recovery from a dangerous illness, produced by great exposure and much suffering, you will be pleased, sir, to accept my sincere congratulations.

In conducting the movements of the squadron entrusted to your charge, you have displayed that intelligence, promptitude, and vigor, which effectually arresting the depredations of the freebooters, have afforded security to our trade, and justly entitle you to the unqualified approbation of this Department, and to the thanks of your country.

The conduct of the officers and men under your command, has been such as might have been expected, from the example of their chief; and you will be pleased, sir, to assure them of the consideration in which their services are held, and the high sense entertained of their devotion to a most arduous and dangerous service.

The want of medical aid, of which you so justly complain, will claim the early and special attention of this Department.

If the state of your health will permit, you will take upon yourself the general superintending direction of the equipment of the vessels of your squadron, now at this yard and at Norfolk. Let their commanders report to you their wants, that you may make them known to the Board of Navy Commissioners, who will cause every requisite supply to be furnished.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,
I. CHAUNCEY, for the Secretary of the Navy.

DAVID PORTER, Esq., commanding a Squadron in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to Commodore Porter.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, December 2, 1823.

SIR: You will, as speedily as possible, with all the vessels under your command, resume your station at Thompson's Island, and continue your exertions to repress piracy, and protect our commerce.

It is the intention of the Department to increase the force under your command, as soon as it can be effected. To this end, the frigate Congress will, after her arrival in the United States, be ordered to join you, and in the course of the spring one or more sloops of war will be added to those already with you. The officers engaged in the survey of the coast of Florida will report to you, and you will communicate their proceedings to this Department.

You will keep as constantly as you can, one of your vessels in the neighborhood of Vera Cruz, cruising between that port and Punto Lazardo, to protect our commerce in that quarter. As soon as possible send the Hornet, or one of the large schooners, to cruise on the coast of Africa, touching at Cape Messurado, ministering to the wants of the African agency, and thence returning in the usual track of the slave ships.

Let the cruise of the vessel be such as will comport, as far as possible, with the health and comfort of the officers and men. Upon its return, you will report the proceedings to this Department, and send another vessel upon the same service.

Our national vessels ought not, and must not, be used for purposes of commercial adventure. You may receive on board specie, and the articles permitted by the act "for the better government of the navy," belonging exclusively to our own citizens, and carry them from one port or place to another, when it does not, in any degree, interfere with your other duties, or violate the laws of the country where you are. You may also bring to the United States specie belonging to our own citizens; but you are, in no case, to permit anything in the shape or character of public advertisements to be used for the purpose of giving information that you will carry them. So many complaints have been publicly made on this subject, that you will carefully abstain from everything which can give rise to unfriendly comments; and that the government may know the extent to which the commercial interests of our citizens are benefited by the assistance afforded by our public vessels on this point, and be prepared to answer any complaints on the subject which may be made by individuals or governments, you will, from time to time, make reports to this Department of all the specie and other articles you may carry, the places to and from which you carry them, and the circumstances, terms and conditions under which you do it.

I certify that the above is a true extract from the records of the Navy Department.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to Commodore Porter, dated—

DECEMBER 31, 1823.

I have received several communications from you, by the mail of this morning, and shall attend to them as early as possible.

I have ordered Captain Biddle, (the orders sent herewith,) to report to you for duty, and you will dispatch him in the Congress, to the Floridas, on the Thompson's Island station, with such orders as you may consider necessary to execute the views of the Department contained in the instructions heretofore given you. You will send with him all the vessels under your command, which are ready, and will permit no delay which is not indispensable.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to Commodore Porter, dated—

MAY 17, 1824.

Congress has not, until within a few days, passed an appropriation law for the current year. This will account to you for one or two of the drafts of Purser Thornton not having been honored, and for the delay in preparing the vessels to join you. It was impossible, without funds, to fit out the Hornet or the Porpoise, and to prepare a larger vessel.

There will be now as much activity as possible, but it is feared one cannot be prepared in time to reach you before the sickly season commences. It shall, however, be done, if possible.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 24, 1824.

SIR: Your letter of the 3d instant has been received, advising that a bill of exchange, drawn by Purser Thornton upon this Department for $5,000, had been returned protested; this circumstance is to be regretted, both as it respects the injury done to the credit of Navy bills, and the damages incurred in the present instance. The refusal to pay this draft when offered, was occasioned entirely by the want of funds, in the passage of the annual appropriation bill by Congress; and an occurrence of the kind, I trust, will not again take place.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 31, 1824.

SIR: Your letter of the 4th of May has been received. The Decoy will be prepared to return to you as speedily as possible. No provision has been made for the repairs of the Grayhound; and it is probable that she will be laid up or sold.

When any vessels are ordered home for repairs, they must be reported to the Department, that orders may be issued for the purpose.

The amount of force, at this time, on the station, is less than was intended; but the delay in passing the appropriation law has rendered it impossible to send you either the Hornet or Porpoise. They will be both dispatched now, as soon as they can be prepared. This delay is the more to be regretted, as the Hornet must either encounter the rainy season, or not go to the coast of Africa, as was originally designed.

You have now under your command, the John Adams, Hornet, Spark, Porpoise, Shark, Sea Gull, Decoy, and seven small schooners, in all fourteen vessels, exclusive of the barges. I did intend to send a larger vessel than any of them, but the amount of the appropriation, and the time it was made, will probably put it out of my power. It shall still, however, be done, if it can be accomplished.

I regret the state of your medical aid. You have now eleven medical officers attached to the station; and within ten months past, there have been under your command no less than five surgeons and seventeen surgeons' mates; many of them acting as surgeons, and fitted for the office. With such numbers, your medical assistance ought not to have been so reduced as you state it to be at present. Neither these nor other officers must be permitted to leave the station for slight excuses. If they are, it will be impossible for the Department to keep the station supplied. All that can be done with the numbers for which provision is made by law, will be done. In the mean time, those with you must be retained, unless absolute necessity compels them to leave you.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

NAVY DEPARTMENT, July 29, 1824.

SIR: I enclose a copy of a letter from William Neilson, Esq., president of the American Insurance Company of New York, in relation to the capture of the Mercator, having on board a valuable cargo; and I request that you will make such a disposition of the force under your command as will render piratical aggressions of this description less frequent, if it be possible.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,
(Signed) SAM'L L. SOUTHARD.

Com. DAVID PORTER, commanding U. S. Naval Force,
West Indies, Gulf of Mexico, &c., Bedford Springs.

I certify that the above is a true copy from the original on record in the Navy Department.

MAY 11, 1825.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to Com. David Porter, commanding U. S. squadron, West India station, dated—

NAVY DEPARTMENT, August 9, 1824.

You will execute this order with all practicable dispatch, in order that the John Adams may not be unnecessarily detained.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to Commodore D. Porter, dated—

OCTOBER 14, 1824.

It is deemed expedient by the Executive that you proceed as speedily as possible to your station, in the John Adams, that, by your presence there, the most efficient protection may be afforded to our commerce, and you may be ready to meet any contingencies which occur.

The Constellation will be fitted for sea, and sent to you as speedily as possible.

I certify that the above is a true extract of the original on record in the Navy Department.

MAY 11, 1825.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to Commodore David Porter, dated—

October 15, 1824.

I enclose copy of a resolution of Congress.

The surveys and examinations under it, so far as they relate to Thompson's Island, the Dry Tortugas, Tampa Bay, and Pensacola, are confided to your care, superintendence, and direction. The surveys of the two former places, already made, are supposed to be sufficient. Several officers have been directed to report to you to aid in this duty, and you will assign for it such vessel under your command as you think most proper.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to Captain David Porter, dated—

October 21, 1824.

The presence of a commander on the station being now indispensable, you will proceed to it.

Navy Department, December 27, 1824.

Sir: Your letter of the 15th November last, relating to the extraordinary transactions at Faxardo, in the Island of Porto Rico, on the —— day of that month, has been received and considered. It is not intended, at this time, to pronounce an opinion on the propriety of those transactions on your part, but their importance demands for them a full investigation, and you will proceed, without unnecessary delay, to this place, to furnish such explanations as may be required, of everything connected with their cause, origin, progress, and termination. For that purpose you will bring with you those officers whose testimony is necessary, particularly Lieutenant Platt, and such written evidence as you may suppose useful.

You will return in such convenient vessel as may be best spared from the squadron; and, on your leaving the station, you will deliver the command to Captain Warrington, with all such papers, instructions, and information, as may be useful to enable him, in the most efficient manner, to accomplish all the objects for which the vessels, now under your command, were placed there.

I am very, &c.,

(Signed) SAM'L L. SOUTHARD.

Navy Department, March 16, 1825.

Sir: It has become my duty to apprise you of the determination of the Executive, that a court of inquiry will be formed, as soon as circumstances will permit, to examine into the occurrence at Foxardo, which was the occasion of your recall, and also to comply with the request contained in your letter of the 8th instant.

It was the intention of the Department in ordering Captain Warrington to the West Indies, to relieve you from the command of the squadron there.

I am, respectfully, &c.,

WASHINGTON, March 22, 1825.

Samuel L. Southard, Esq., Secretary of the Navy:

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday, which informs me that you are requested by Commodore Porter to apprise me that a court of inquiry will be held in a few days; one object of which will be to investigate his conduct in relation to the carrying of specie, and neglect of his duties in the suppression of piracy.

Doubtless Commodore Porter in requesting, and you, sir, in making this formal communication to me of a fact which had already been published to the world, considered the notice of some special import to me, and designed that it should produce a correspondent effect upon my conduct. But as your letter does not state the relation in which I am considered as standing either to Commodore Porter or to the court, nor prescribe any course to be pursued by me, I am at a loss to know the object it was designed to produce.

I have therefore to request that you will be pleased to state how I am particularly interested in the fact you announce, and the effect your letter was designed to produce upon my conduct, in reference to the appproaching investigation.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,
(Signed) THOMAS RANDALL.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 11, 1825.

I certify that the foregoing is a correct copy from the original, on file in this Department, and that it is a copy of the letter alluded to in the letter from the Secretary of the Navy to Commodore David Porter, dated 23d March, 1825.
CHAS. HAY, Chief Clerk.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, March 24, 1825.

SIR: Midshipman Rowan, of the West Indian squadron, has applied for leave of absence to visit his friends in Ohio. I have suspended a decision, at his request, until I can be informed whether you will require his testimony in the investigation which you have called for.

Your early attention to this is requested.

APRIL 20, 1825.

Enclosed you will receive a copy of the precept which has been issued for a court to make the inquiry, instituted by the Executive, into your conduct at Foxardo. You will perceive that the same court is also directed to make the inquiry which has been granted at your own request.

OFFICIAL COMMUNICATIONS FROM COMMODORE PORTER TO THE DEPARTMENT.

[Extract.]

BALTIMORE, December 21, 1823.

SIR: In pursuance of the instructions of the Board of Navy Commissioners of the 17th, I yesterday purchased eight schooners, which will all sail on the 23d or 24th for Norfolk, to receive their armaments and equipments. Most of the vessels are quite new, requiring no repairs, and may be sent on service at a very trifling expense.

The cost of the whole will be, when delivered at Norfolk, $10,190, averaging a little over $1,273; having for their outfits $327 dollars each, which I presume will be sufficient; but as this will be a part of the operation over the expense of which I can have no control, I cannot pretend to say that they will not exceed the limits which you have prescribed to me.

I have named these vessels as follows, and their tonnage is annexed, viz:

Ferret, 51: Weasel, 53; Terrier, 61; Jackal, 47; Fox, 51; Wild Cat, 48; Grayhound, 65; Beagle, 52.

They are all of light draft of water, and have every appearance of sailing well. I have not in every instance been able to get the owners to deliver them at Norfolk, but shall labor under no inconvenience on that account, as there are a number of men recruiting to be sent down, who can go to their officers in those which we have to deliver.

(Signed) D. PORTER.

U. S. SCHOONER PEACOCK, Hampton Roads, February 23, 1823.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you, that I am now anchored in these roads with the whole squadron, with the exception of the barges, which will be ready to leave Norfolk in the course of two days, and will proceed direct to Thompson's Island.

My course with the squadron will be circuitous, and will be regulated by your instructions of the 4th inst.

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Directed to the honorable S. THOMPSON, Secretary of the Navy, Washington City.

Commodore Perry to the Secretary of the Navy.

U. S. SHIP PEACOCK, St. Thomas, March 3, 1823.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you, that I this morning arrived at this place, with all the squadron under my command, except the Grayhound, which vessel separated in a gale.

I have dispatched Lieutenant Commandant Perry, with the Shark and three small schooners, to scour the south side of Porto Rico, and shall sail to-morrow with the rest of the squadron for St. John's, where I have been informed several privateers have been fitted out, which have done considerable injury to our commerce.

I am also informed that there is a large British naval force in those seas, a squadron of which, apparently on the look-out, I fell in with this morning.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

D. PORTER.

Honorable S. THOMPSON, Secretary of the Navy.

Commodore Porter to the Secretary of the Navy.

U. S. SHIP PEACOCK, Matanzas, March 28, 1823.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you, that I arrived here on the 26th, after giving to the north coast of St. Domingo and Cuba as thorough an examination as was practicable, with the two schooners, and the boats of this ship, with the greater part of her crew; while all the keys off shore, pointed out to me as the rendezvous of pirates, were examined by the ship.

The service has been very fatiguing to those employed, for more than a week past, in open boats, and in the most dangerous and intricate navigation in the world; but it has been performed cheerfully, and I wish I could say successfully; but we have not, in this long route, been able to detect a single pirate, although our suspicions rested on many; nor can I conceive how we shall ever be able to detect them: for they are one day fishermen, another droguers, wood-cutters, salt gatherers, or pirates, as best suits them. Every Spaniard is armed with a knife, and this weapon, according to their mode of warfare, is enough for them. Were we to apprehend every suspicious Spaniard and vessel, their coasting trade would soon be entirely broken up. Since my arrival here, I have heard of the most horrid atrocities committed by them. They now spare no one; whole ships' crews are indiscriminately burnt with their vessels; and there has been an instance recently of the murder of a crew under the wall of the Moro.

I have written to the captain general a letter similar to the one I wrote to the captain general of Puerto Rico, calling on him for information and co-operation, and await his reply, which I expect to-morrow or next day, and shall then proceed to Thompson's Island, to make arrangementsf or the most energetic operations. I shall there meet all the force which I dispatched from Aguadilla, with the exception of the Shark.

On my arrival here, I found a fleet of American vessels waiting for convoy, some of which had been ready for sea twenty days, and was surprised and mortified to find that all our vessels of war had left this coast, and our commerce here entirely unprotected.

The only protection I can give them is the two small vessels, which will convoy them beyond the reach of pirates, and after examining a bay to windward, which has been their resort for some time, will join the squadron at the place of rendezvous.

The departure of those vessels of war stationed here for the protection of our commerce, and which I calculated on finding here, has caused me some embarrassment: as it becomes necessary to employ part of the force which was intended for the pursuit and destruction of pirates to give that protection to our trade which it has a right to. The reasons for their departure are unknown to me, and I must leave it to their commanders to make the necessary explanations. Five piratical vessels have for some weeks been watching the fleet in the bay, which I shall cause to be examined; and since our arrival, as you will find by the enclosed copy of a note from a highly respectable source, they have dispersed and disarmed. I shall do all in my power, with whatever force may be at my disposal, to give protection to our commerce, and effect the destruction of pirates; and protection shall be the primary object; but, to fulfill the expectations that have been formed, we shall want at least two or three of the large schooners, in addition to those we now have.

I was surprised to learn, on my arrival here, that circulars had been written by the captain general to the governors and commanders of the different districts of the island, forbidding the entrance of my squadron into any of its ports, or the landing of any part of my forces in pursuit of pirates. The island appears at present in a very agitated state, and the government appear to think that the United States would consider it a very desirable acquisition. I shall use every means in my power to satisfy them that my objects are totally unconnected with anything of a political nature.

All vessels ordered under my command, I beg may be directed to report to me at Thompson's Island.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. PORTER.

Hon. Smith Thompson, Secretary of the Navy, Washington City.

P. S.—Since writing the above, I have heard of a pirate to leeward, and have dispatched the two schooners and boats after her. I shall know the result of the expedition in the course of a few hours, and have good reason to believe it will prove successful.

Extract of a letter from Commodore Porter to the Secretary of the Navy, dated—

U. S. Steam Galliot Sea Gull, Matanzas, April 16, 1823.

Sir: For the last two weeks, our movements and occupations have been so various, that to enter into a full detail, would swell too much this communication; to be brief, therefore, I shall merely state that, within that time, we have built our store houses on Thompson's Island, landed all our stores, collected together all the schooners of the squadron, and stationed them at different points on the coast of Cuba; fitted out all the barges which were also on the coast, and captured one pirate, a pilot boat schooner, formerly the Pilot, of Norfolk, armed with one long twelve-pounder, and commanded by Domingo, the notorious head of this horde of desperadoes, who formerly commanded the Saragariana—the vessel, in the attempt to capture which, the gallant Allen fell—Domingo, and two of his crew, only escaping to the shore with their lives, and one was taken.

The Pilot had been in possession of the pirates eight days; I had heard of her capture on my first touching in at Matanzas with the Peacock, and left the two schooners the Wild Cat and Beagle, to look out for her and the Saragariana to windward, while the Peacock shaped her course towards Havana; but, not finding her, I hastened to Thompson's Island, and two of the barges being got ready, and manned from her fine crew, I dispatched Captain Cassin with them and two of the schooners, which soon arrived, to examine from Havana down to Cape Antonio, and thence to Trinidad, on the south side of the island. A piracy having recently been committed near the latter place, Captain Cassin left Thompson's Island on the morning of the —, and next morning received information that the Pilot had been seen off the Moro; he consequently sent Lieutenant Stribling to windward, along shore, with the barges, while he kept a look out for her near Havana; on the same day, the Wild Cat and Beagle fell in with her to leeward of Matanzas, chased her to within gun-shot the greater part of the day, giving and receiving from the Pilot a smart fire; but night coming on, she eluded them by getting close under the land, hauling down all sail, and getting off with her sweeps. In about an hour after this, Lieutenant Stribling ran alongside of her with his two boats, one commanded by himself, the other by Midshipman Kelly, acting as lieutenant of the Fox, and took possession of her, after a fire of ten minutes, in which time, all the crew, except the captain and three others, one of whom is taken, were killed, the pirate having time to fire his long gun only once; and what adds to the satisfaction I feel in giving these particulars, which I have obtained from Lieutenant Skinner, who fell in with Lieutenant Stribling and his prize next morning, is, that no one was even wounded on board our boats, so sudden and effectual was the attack, which does great credit to Lieutenant Stribling, and all those concerned with him in this gallant affair.

I have with me, here, the Sea Gull, three barges, and one of the boats belonging to the Peacock, besides the vessels intended for convoy. The barges I have placed under the command of Lieutenant Cassin, of the Peacock; which ship, as well as the Decoy, I have been compelled to lay up, in order to obtain men to man the barges, not having found a single vessel on the station on my arrival.

I shall dispatch Lieutenant Cassin to windward, so soon as the weather will permit, where I have strong expectation, from information received, of breaking up a nest of these vagabonds. Two schooners, under Lieutenant Commandant Kearney, are stationed off Havana, to give convoy; two are now refitting to relieve some of the others, and we are now in full operation. But it is greatly to be regretted that I should have been compelled to employ for convoy those small schooners, which were intended solely for the purpose of hunting the pirates out of their hiding holes; but, notwithstanding I have not, including the crew of the Peacock, the number of men required to man one of our large frigates, I hope to effect the object for which I was sent here, and, for a time, give protection to our commerce by convoy. Yet the duty is severe, and more than men can long bear; some respite will be necessary. But it would be unjust in me if I did not say, that every officer and man under my command enter with the utmost alacrity and zeal into the severe duties which this novel service imposes on them; and, although most of them have scarcely put their feet on shore from their cramped vessels since they left the United States; although they have suffered all that men could suffer in crossing the gulf stream, in heavy gales, in open boats; still, not a murmur has been heard from any one. Some, from sickness, and finding themselves unequal to the fatigue, have asked leave to return, and I have indulged them; but, in general the squadron enjoys uncommon health, and there is every prospect of its continuance.

Domingo, the captain of the Pilot, was in this place yesterday, the day of my arrival, and has since disappeared. He acknowledges the death of all his crew, except those before mentioned.

The Pilot is a remarkable sailer; was a constant trader to Havana. Domingo had long set his heart on having her, and, immediately on capturing her, armed and took the command of her. I hope soon to give you some further account of him and the Saragariana. There was one act of politeness in this singular character, which I cannot omit mentioning. There were a large number of letters for myself, and the officers of the squadron, on board the Pilot when she was taken, together with many for merchants in Cuba. Domingo possessed himself of all the mercantile letters, and delivered to the captain of the Pilot all those for us, desiring him to send them to us, as he did not wish to deprive us of the opportunity of hearing from our friends. He said he had no ill-will against us; we were but doing our duty.

The Peacock, sir, is too fine a ship to keep in a state of idleness; and without her crew, I should not have been able to man the barges, by far the most efficient force we have.

In the present state of the establishment at the island, it will be in vain to look for those comforts which the fatigues of the kind of life we now lead, make more necessary to us than they would be at other times, without the conveniences which a ship affords. I do not make this remark so much on my own account as on account of others. The accommodations of the Peacock are small. We have been a great inconvenience to her officers; and it has been the source of great pain to me to witness how much myself, and those who necessarily accompanied me, have been to Captain Cassin and his officers, who have made every sacrifice of their own comfort for our accommodation.

It would be extremely satisfactory to me, and, I am persuaded, would be highly advantageous to the public interest, if I could have a ship and crew for the accommodation of myself and those with me. The Erie would suit me extremely well if she had a poop on her. I want no larger or better ship, and I beg I may not be refused, for, at present, I am completely on the parish, not living as I could wish, but as I can. This is the only request I have made since I embarked in the enterprise, in which I am individually concerned; and it would not have been made, were I not satisfied that the public interests would be more benefited than my own comfort would be promoted. If I cannot have the Erie, I beg that I might have the Macedonian, or some one other of our frigates; but, whatever ship may be sent, I hope she may be furnished with a poop. It is essentially necessary in this climate, and on such a service.

I have the honor to be, your very obedient servant,

D. PORTER.

The honorable SECRETARY of the Navy.

Commodore Porter to the Secretary of the Navy.

U. S. STEAM GALLIOT SEA GULL, Matanzas, April 24, 1823.

SIR: In my last, I informed you that I had dispatched the barges to examine a bay to windward of Point Yeacos; and having intelligence of three piratical schooners in the river Palmas, I left this place on the 19th, joined the barges next day near Key Blanco, and, after a laborious search of two days, discovered the river, where we found the remains of the vessels, which the pirates had burnt, evidently a short time before our arrival there; I consequently returned to this place, sending three of the barges along the coast to Havana, to which place I shall proceed, after giving convoy to the vessels in this place, having found it necessary to send the two vessels employed here on this service to Thompson's Island, to refit.

I believe, sir, I can now say with safety, that there is not a pirate afloat on this part of the coast of Cuba, larger than an open boat; and even that is doubtful, the Saragoziana, in her flight from here, having been taken by two British sloops-of-war at the east end of the island.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

D. PORTER.

HON. SMITH THOMPSON.

Extract of a letter from Commodore David Porter to the Secretary of the Navy, dated—

U. S. Galliot Sea Gull, Allenton, Thompson's Island, May 10, 1823.

Since I last had the honor to address you, I have returned to this place with the Sea Gull and barges, and found here Captain Cassin, with the schooners and barges that accompanied him.

The report of his cruise is enclosed. Our last cruise has been, altogether, a most arduous and fatiguing one; and, although we have not many trophies to show, it has not been without effect; the result has been, the capture of a piratical schooner and a very fine felucca; the destruction of one on shore, the burning of three schooners in the Rio Palmas, and about a dozen of their houses in the different establishments to leeward of Bahia Honda, and inside the Colorados reef; the complete dispersion of all their gangs from Rio Palmas to Cape Antonio; and, what will be of no little importance to all our future operations, a most thorough and intimate acquaintance with the whole line of coast, from Cayo Blanco to the east, down to Cape Antonio in the west. We have taken only one prisoner, and I shall endeavor to use such information as I can squeeze out of him to advantage. I shall dispatch the Peacock to-day for La Vera Cruz, to relieve the Shark, and shall now be left with only my small vessels, two of which, with two barges, (which I have found great difficulty in manning from the Sea Gull and store ship,) I shall send off this evening under the command of Lieutenant Commandant Watson, on an expedition among the Keys in the Old Straits, and thence, around the island, to return by the way of Cape Antonio.

Two schooners, under the command of Lieutenant Commandant Rose, are making the circuit by the other route, commencing at Point Yeacos, going round Cape Antonio, and returning by the Old Straits; two, under command of Lieutenant Commandant Skinner, are convoying from Havana; and the remaining two are careening, and will in a few days sail for the protection of our commerce; and the three remaining barges are hauled up for the want of men.

I beg you, sir, to take into consideration the uncomfortable situation of myself and those with me, and, as early as may be possible, send me a frigate, or a large sloop-of-war fitted for the climate, or I shall otherwise, most reluctantly, on account of health, be compelled to relinquish a service which I set my heart on accomplishing—the total suppression of piracy in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico; it has been effected about the north side of Cuba, and, with suitable means, I have no doubt of effecting it elsewhere.

Not one of the vessels of war belonging to the West India station, except those which I brought with me from the United States, have yet shown themselves, nor can I get any intelligence of them, by which I can be enabled to command their services.

When I left Matanzas, the country was alarmed by large bands of robbers, well mounted and armed, who had plundered several estates, and committed some murders in the neighborhood of the city. Bodies of horse had been sent in pursuit of them, and the militia were all under arms; some prisoners had been taken, and it was said that those bands were composed of the freebooters which lately infested the coast, and who, being compelled to abandon the ocean, had taken up this new line of business.

Extract of a letter from Commodore David Porter to the Secretary of the Navy, dated—

Sea Gull, Allenton, May 11, 1823.

We are very much in want of one hundred seamen and ordinary seamen, in addition to our present number, to enable us to carry on our operations; and if we do not obtain them, I shall be under the necessity of discontinuing the employment of the barges; at present I can only man two of them, and to do so am compelled to lay up this vessel and the Decoy.

We shall also want a number of officers, of every class; how many I am unable to say yet; but, from present appearances I am induced to believe that many will (in not a very long time) wish to return to the United States. The service we are employed on is a very harassing one, and, if it should not occasion much waste of life, it will, at least, try the strength of our constitutions, and our capacity for the endurance of fatigue and privations.

The commanding officer of marines states to me that he requires, in addition to his present force, fifty officers, non-commissioned officers and privates; and from the difficulty of supplying the guards which I require, I should presume that a larger number would be necessary.

From the importance of the trade of Cuba and the Gulf of Mexico, the whole of which is now completely protected from this place, with a force not equal to one frigate, I presume my requests will not be considered extravagant. The arrivals and departures of American vessels, from the port of Havana alone, average about thirty per week, and those from Matanzas about twenty. Not a day elapses but that great numbers of American vessels are to be met passing through the Gulf, and since an establishment here they daily in numbers pass in sight of us.

I mention these facts to give you an idea of the importance of this station, and to show the propriety of augmenting the force by the additions which I have asked.

A frigate, or a large sloop-of-war, is indispensable to us, and we cannot exist with anything like comfort without one.

Thrown as we are on a barren and desolate island, that does not supply even water, I hope our situation may be made as free from sufferings as the Department can, without inconvenience to the public interest, make it.

U. S. Galliot Sea Gull, Allenton, Thompson's Island, May 19, 1823.

Sir: I have the honor to inform you that not a single piratical act has been committed on the coast of Cuba since I organized and arranged my forces.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant, D. PORTER.

Hon. Secretary of the Navy.

Extracts from a letter of Commodore D. Porter to the Secretary of the Navy, dated—

U. S. GALLIOT SEA GULL, Allenton, May 23, 1823.

SIR: We have a vastly important commerce to Havana and Matanzas, which is now left to the protection of a small schooner of three guns, at each place; all the others, with the exception of two, coming in to repair, are cruising for pirates on the south side of the island, and in the Old Strait of Bahama.

I am at present left with only the Sea Gull, as the store ship is on the point of sailing for a load of water for us, the lagoons on the island having dried up.

I beg, sir, that our situation may be taken into consideration, and that some means may be speedily employed to ameliorate it. The principal thing wanting is a large vessel, and the aid and comforts which she would afford. At present, I have no place to shelter me but the awning of this small vessel. I cannot obtain hands enough for my use to man a boat. I have no comforts whatever, and I find my health gradually sinking. I would be the last to complain without cause; but the rainy and sickly season is now coming on, and I should fail in my duty, were I not to acquaint you with our true situation.

Allow me to suggest, that this appears to me to be the most suitable place to give protection to the commerce of the Gulf of Mexico, and that all the forces now employed at New Orleans, could be much more advantageously employed here.

Extract of a letter from Com. David Porter to the Secretary of the Navy, dated—

SEA GULL, Allenton, June 4, 1823.

I yesterday was informed of a piratical schooner on the south side of Cuba, which had captured two vessels, and I immediately dispatched the Grayhound in pursuit of her.

It is with regret I inform you, that I am compelled to discontinue giving convoy from Havana, as my forces are now so scattered, that it cannot be done without neglecting the main object of the expedition. When our cruising was on this side the island, I found less difficulty in the thing.

We are greatly in want of larger vessels, and more men, and I sincerely hope that they may be sent as early as possible.

Commodore Porter to the Secretary of the Navy.

U. S. GALLIOT SEA GULL, Allenton, June 6, 1823.

SIR: We are greatly in want of medical aid on this station. Doctor Williamson, in charge of the hospital, and Doctor Edger, in charge of the sick in the harbor, have both been taken seriously ill, within a few days, which leaves me with only one surgeon's mate. The small vessels are equally in a suffering condition, having but one acting mate between two of them; and, had it not been for the few acting appointments given by me, they would have been entirely destitute.

I beg, sir, that our situation may be taken into consideration, and as the sickly season is fast approaching, I hope that several surgeons' mates may be sent out to us. Six, at least, in addition to our present number, are required.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

D. PORTER.

Honorable SECRETARY of the Navy.

Extract from a letter of Commodore D. Porter to the Secretary of the Navy, dated—

SEA GULL, Allenton, June 24, 1823.

SIR: By the Hornet, just arrived, I am informed of the capture of two piratical launches by the Ferret, Lieutenant Commandant Newell, a few leagues to the west of Matanzas.

It appears that they were chased into a small harbor, where there was not water sufficient for the schooner; and on the approach of her boat, (carrying only four persons,) they, (about forty,) commenced a fire on her from behind the rocks, and nearly sunk her. The schooner then opened a fire on them with her nine-pounder, drove them from their skulking places, and took possession of the launches.

Such is the account I have received from Lieutenant Shubrick, of the Hornet, whose ship fell in with Lieutenant Commandant Newell on his passage.

There is good reason to believe that these are the boats which plundered the American brig Mary Joan, Captain Hubbard, inside the Bay of Matanzas, twelve days since.

It appears that these launches were captured about the 19th inst.; that their cruise has been only of six days' duration; and that they were taken in not more than three days after I received information respecting them.

It is expected that this prompt detection and punishment of the first attempt at piracy, since the arrangement of my forces on the coast, will deter them, at least for a time, from fitting out any new expeditions.

Commodore Porter to the Secretary of the Navy.

SEA GULL, Allenton, Thompson's Island, July 17, 1823.

SIR: It is with infinite satisfaction I do myself the honor to lay before you Lieutenant Commandant Watson's official report of the almost total annihilation of the crews of two piratical vessels, by the barges Gallinipper and Musquito, under his command.

When we take into consideration the immense superiority of force opposed to him, the advantage and preparation on the part of the pirates, and the result of the action, we cannot but be impressed with the conviction, that nothing less than Providential influence and protection could have occasioned consequences so fatal to the pirates, and so exempt from injury on our side as to appear almost miraculous.

The five surviving pirates, being desperately wounded, I have, in compliment to the favorable disposition and zealous co-operation of the authorities of Havana, sent to the Captain General of Cuba, to be tried by the laws of Spain.

Enclosed is a copy of my letter to him on the subject.

I cannot close this communication, without expressing a hope that the brilliant success of Lieutenant Commandant Watson, and his excellent character as an officer and man, may induce the Department to promote him to a higher grade, as the most suitable reward for his services.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

D. PORTER.

Hon. SMITH THOMPSON, Secretary of the Navy.

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, August 1, 1823.

SIR: Application has been made to me by the American consul, to take one million of dollars from La Vera Cruz to Cadiz, in October, and as we have but few opportunities in this way, to make a little for ourselves, may I ask the indulgence of the Department in this respect.

If a direct conveyance cannot be granted, can I send the money to the United States; and can a transhipment take place from thence to Cadiz? This course will obviate all objections as regards the belligerent character of the property, if any exists.

An answer by the return vessel is desirable. I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Honorable SECRETARY of the Navy.

I certify the above to be a true copy from the original.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 10, 1825.

Extract of a letter from Commodore David Porter to the Secretary of the Navy, dated—

ON BOARD THE SEA GULL, Allenton, Thompson's Island, August 1, 1823.

I have been engaged, since the return of the barges under Lieutenant Commandant Watson, in preparing them for an expedition to the piratical establishment at New Malaga, against the arrival of the expected vessels, from which I calculated on getting men; but I have lately been informed, by the arrival of a British brig-of-war at this place, (with every officer and man down with the yellow fever, except thirteen,) that a sloop-of-war and several light vessels from Jamaica, have gone against that place. I shall, consequently, as there is much danger from sickness on that coast, delay my departure until I hear the result of the British expedition, and have directed the commander of the Hornet to take one of the small schooners, (now on the coast of Cuba,) with him, to send back with such information as he may collect on the subject. There have been no captures, (except Spanish, by open boats,) by pirates, on this side of the Island of Cuba, since I have been here and no pirate has appeared that we have not captured.

Extract of a letter from Commodore David Porter to the Secretary of the Navy, dated—

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, August 31, 1823.

It is with the deepest regret I have to inform you, the yellow fever has lately made its appearance among us to an alarming degree, and has carried off several. For information as to the number of deaths, and the present situation of the sick, I beg leave to refer you to the enclosed medical reports, and to say that we are badly off for medical assistance.

Commodore Porter to Commodore Chauncey.

WASHINGTON CITY, October 27, 1823.

SIR: I have the honor to report to you my arrival here, in the United States galliot the Sea Gull, from Thompson's Island, in forty-three days, and from which place I was driven, with the squadron, by a pestilence which made its appearance there, carrying off, in a short time, for the want of the necessary medical aid on the station, a great number of valuable officers and men. This circumstance induced me to order the large vessels to Hampton Roads, there to remain for a short time, where medical assistance, if required by them on their arrival, could be obtained. But I am happy to inform you that, with the exception of some intermittents, contracted since their arrival, they are perfectly healthy, as all the small vessels were which were left on the station.

The vessels on the West India station have never been more healthy than they have been this season, the disease with which we have been afflicted being altogether local, and originating in the decomposition of vegetable substances, after the heavy rains, and during the succeeding intense heat of the weather. My experience convinces me that, from the middle of July to the middle of October, the lee side of Thompson's Island is an unfit residence for man; for the rest of the year, no place within the tropics can be more healthy. Those who have resided on the weather side of the island have at all times been exempt from the sickness with which those to the leeward have been afflicted. As a place of deposit for our stores, and of repair for our vessels employed on the coast of Cuba, no place can be better adapted; but, while the same causes for disease exist, and they must ever exist, it would not be prudent to make it a permanent station, where many men would be exposed to the baneful influence of the sickly season. As we are now happily situated, with regard to the authorities of Cuba, the inconvenience of an absence of three or four months from Thompson's Island would not be felt, and the excellent and healthy harbor of Matanzas, where we enjoy every facility and convenience from the local authorities, will obviate all the other inconveniences which might otherwise be experienced. The short delay of receiving stores from on board the ships from the island, and the position they may take outside the harbor, free from the influence of the poisonous vapor which arises from the ponds, would render them secure from its effects. Should it be the design of the government to keep a force there, I had proposed to myself this arrangement. Under all circumstances, however, it will be proper to have more medical men on the station; and had the necessary number been furnished this year, the squadron would have been, no doubt, in a great measure, saved from the deplorable consequences which have resulted, as the disease, in the commencement, was completely under the control of medicine; but, I regret to say, that several perished without receiving any medical aid whatever, and without ever seeing a physician. The whole of the medical men, with scarcely an exception, were, from their great fatigue and exposure, taken down with the disease, and we were left to perish for want of that assistance which we thought ourselves entitled to. I am well aware, however, of the difficulties the Department has labored under to make the surgeons do their duty.

The Sea Gull will want coppering, and some other repairs; the rest of the vessels are in general in good order. Several of the officers of the squadron under my orders request leave of absence for a short time, and many applications are daily made to me on points of duty relating to my command. I beg to be informed by you, whether I am to act on these matters as I have done heretofore, or to leave them to the management of the Navy Department.

I shall hold myself, and the vessels, ready to return to the station, so soon as it can be done with safety to those on board. I must entreat of you, however, an additional supply of medical men for the vessels of the squadron, and for the establishment on shore.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant, D. PORTER.

Com. ISAAC CHAUNCEY, Senior Member of the Board of Navy Comm'rs, and Acting Sec. of the Navy.

Com. Porter to the Secretary of the Navy.

BALTIMORE, November 19, 1823.

SIR: In conformity with your wishes, verbally expressed to me, I have the honor to submit to you a brief outline of my proceedings in the West Indies, with the squadron under my command, for the suppression of piracy, and for the protection of persons and property, of the citizens of the United States.

In order to take in as large a field for operation as possible, I proceeded with my squadron, consisting of a sloop-of-war, a steam galliot, a store ship, and nine schooners, to windward, touching at St. Thomas, showing my forces off the forts of Porto Rico; and although my presence there was attended with the loss of a gallant young officer, it resulted in the raising of the blockade of the coasts of the Columbian republic, and gave a check to a system of licensed piracy, which had for a long time previously been practiced, from St. John's, and other ports of that island.

From thence, I continued to scour the coasts of the islands of the West Indies to Cuba, the place of our destination, where we found piracy in full force; but, by the extraordinary activity and vigilance of the officers and men under my command, it was, in less than two months from our arrival, as completely suppressed, as it is at this moment, or will be for several years.

The actual presence of an active naval force, with a proper understanding with the authorities on shore, being the only means by which the hordes of desperadoes, which have so long infested the almost unknown coasts of this extensive island, can be completely exterminated, happily the utmost cordiality and most perfect co-operation have existed between the authorities of Cuba and myself; and, from them, I have received every countenance which could aid me in effecting an object so interesting to the whole civilized world, and so honorable to the character of our country; and from those under my command, a zeal and activity which have been rarely equaled, and, I will venture to say, have never been surpassed, in any navy, or on any service.

Humanity will deplore the loss of the many gallant spirits which accompanied me, and which shared in this most arduous duty; but she will console herself in the reflection, that the whole world has benefited by their exertions, and that numbers unknown have, by them, been saved from the knives of the most blood-thirsty monsters that ever disgraced the name of man.

The details of the operations of the forces entrusted to me have, from time to time, been communicated to you. I beg leave, therefore, to refer you to the archives of the office for more minute information. It will, I hope, suffice to say that, at present, I have no knowledge of the existence of any piratical establishment, vessels, or boats, or of a pirate afloat, in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico. They have all been burnt, taken, destroyed, and driven to the shore, where the latter have, in most cases, been speedily captured by the local military.

Some severity has been exercised while the battle lasted, but the result has been beneficial, the examples having struck a panic which will, no doubt, long serve to deter others from embarking in similar pursuits.

The fixing an establishment at Thompson's Island for rendezvous and supplies, as my instructions required, has had the most happy effect in attaining the object in view. Its vicinity to Havana, placed, as it were, in the thoroughfare of vessels sailing through the gulf, makes it, in many points of view, an object of great importance to the United States; and, although for three months in the year it must ever remain sickly, while existing causes continue, it is, from its extraordinary salubrity for the remainder of the year, worthy a closer examination, to ascertain whether they may not be eradicated. It is my opinion that, by thinning the woods and draining off the heavy rains of the month of June, thereby promoting a free circulation of air, evaporation and dispersion of the water rendered stagnant by the excessive heat of June, and which causes the rapid decomposition of the vegetable matter with which the island abounds, the months of August, September, and October might be sufficiently healthy for the residence of man; but, at present, the poisonous effluvia arising from these causes is almost certain destruction to whoever breathes it. Had I been aware of its pernicious effects, I could, without any inconvenience, have guarded against them by an earlier removal of the ships; but it took us by surprise, and the malignity of the disease was unparalleled. It is certain that it originated on the island, for our ships, with the exception of those sent to work on shore, have, in their crews, enjoyed uncommon health.

In my intercourse with foreign officers, in general, I have received from them every attention, and from none more than those of the British navy. The Jamacia station had heretofore been commanded by an admiral; but, when Sir Edward Owens, an officer of the same rank as myself, was charged with a force for the suppression of piracy, Admiral Rowley was recalled to England, that we might meet on equal grounds.

Offers for co-operation were repeatedly made to me, but, feeling that the forces under my command were fully adequate to the object, I declined confining myself to any general plan, leaving it altogether to the accidental meetings of our respective forces, and to circumstances. It affords me pleasure to say, that whenever such meetings did take place, with a common object in view, they have been attended with the happiest results.

The law making appropriation for the suppression of piracy, limited the amount to be expended to $160,000; and, in the expenditure, much latitude was given to me by the honorable Secretary of the Navy and the Board of Navy Commissioners. In the exercise of the trust reposed in me, I have endeavored to observe the utmost economy; and, when all shall be deducted which has been charged to the appropriation for this object, and shall be charged under the proper heads, it will be found that a large unexpended balance will be remaining in the treasury.

The improvements of Thompson's Island, transportation of stores for the general service, medicines, hospital stores, &c., &c., &c., are of this description; and, when the sale of the vessels purchased for this service shall take place, and their proceeds be returned to the treasury, the expense of the expedition will be a subject scarcely worthy of consideration.

Should the gradual withdrawal of the small vessels take place, I beg leave to suggest that a frigate, in addition to the two sloops-of-war now attached to the squadron, is due to the character of our service, to the respectability of our flag in that quarter of the world, and would, by the convenience she would afford to our open boats, in the pursuit of pirates, offer the most certain means of keeping them in check.

The moral effect produced by this expedition should not be overlooked. The system of privateering which has prevailed, has, from its looseness, been the cause of many vexations to our commerce. Our presence has occasioned the oldest governments to recall vessels of this description, and the new governments of America to issue their commissions with more precautions, to guard against abuse; consequently, our commerce is free from interruption, and our flag respected throughout those seas.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

D. PORTER.

Hon. SECRETARY of the Navy, Washington.

WASHINGTON CITY, November 27, 1823.

SIR: Agreeably to your wish, I have perused the letter from Mr. Biddle, and fully concur with him in the necessity of affording protection to our Mexican commerce, and the advantage resulting from the transportation of specie in our ships of war, as the most certain means of taking away the powerful temptation for piratical depredations on merchant vessels.

Since I have had the honor to command on the West India station, I have kept one vessel constantly in the Gulf of Mexico, to give protection to the persons and property of our citizens, and for the transportation of specie to the United States, agreeably to the orders of the honorable Secretary of the Navy, of the 1st February, 1823. Many applications have been made to me to permit cochineal to be embarked with the specie, but I have invariably opposed it, because I had no instructions which would authorize my consenting to the measure; and however it might have been to my interest, or to the interest of the merchants, I was not willing to give my sanction to what might be liable to abuse, and bring censure on me.

I have gone no further in this respect than my orders required, and the consequence has been that many millions have found their way to England in British men-of-war, that would otherwise have been brought to this country in our own ships, as merchants invariably embark their specie in the same vessel with their cochineal.

Of the propriety of adopting the measure, being a party interested, it might be improper in me to speak. I can only say, that whatever orders I may receive, they shall be punctually obeyed; and whatever course the Department may think proper to take, I shall endeavor, by an honest and faithful discharge of the trust reposed in me, to meet its views; and if vigilance can prevent abuses, none shall be practiced by any under my command.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Hon. SAM'L L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy.

I certify the above to be a true copy of the original. CHAS. HAY, Chief Clerk.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 10, 1825.

WASHINGTON CITY, November 29, 1823.

SIR: I have the honor to state to you, that it is in my opinion necessary and proper, that the rate and application of freights for carrying specie in our ships of war, should be fixed by the Department, as there is no existing regulation on the subject.

The merchant is glad to avail himself of the protection and security thus offered to his property, for which he is willing to pay. It is made the duty of the commander of the ship to give protection and security, and to take on himself responsibilities for which he ought to be paid. It increases the duties and responsibilities of the commander of the squadron, for which he ought to be compensated, and it gives some additional trouble and labor to the officers and crew, for which they ought to receive some benefit.

It has been the custom to divide the freight into three parts, of which one part has been given to the commander of the squadron, and the other two to the captain of the ship, thereby making the distribution the same as the shares in prize money; but there being no established rule, it depends altogether on the terms the commander of the squadron and the captain may be on, whether the custom shall continue. For my own part, I have never claimed any share, but it has invariably been paid to me voluntarily by the captains, from a sense of justice on their part.

The British regulations established by a proclamation of the King, dated 12th of July, 1819, copy of which I have the honor to submit to you, divides the amount of freight into four parts, one of which is paid to the commander of the fleet or squadron, two-fourths to the commander of the ship carrying the treasure and signing the bill of lading or receipt, and one-fourth to Greenwich Hospital, for the use of that institution.

This rule embraces every desirable object, and is founded on justice, as it gives to the one who has the greatest responsibility, the largest amount of compensation.

A similar rule might be adopted to advantage in our service, giving one-fourth to the navy pension fund, which should be received by the commander of the squadron, and which he should pay over to those appointed to receive it. As regards the rates of carrying freight, we have always been governed by those established by the proclamation above alluded to, wherein you will perceive a difference between the freight of treasures belonging to the crown, and of those belonging to other parties. In both cases there is great responsibility on the officer commanding, who is held answerable for the exact amount, and it is proper that he should receive an indemnity.

By the adoption of this rule as suggested, I should certainly be the sufferer in a pecuniary point of view; but a strict regard to justice, and a desire to reduce to rule what is now left to chance, which might, under other circumstances, jeopardize the harmony of the squadron, and occasion disputes, induces me to ask your early instructions on the subject.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your very obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, January 14, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to state, for the information of the Board of Navy Commissioners, that I shall put to sea with this ship, the Grampus, and the Sea Gull, on the 17th of this month. The Hornet is still in the hands of the officers of the yard, and it is uncertain when she will be ready. She is in want of one more chain cable, as the one intended for her was sent to the Peacock. There will be sufficient time for one to be made and sent to her before she leaves this place.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Copy of a letter from Com. David Porter to the Secretary of the Navy, dated—

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, Norfolk, January 20, 1824.

SIR: In reference to your letter of the 15th inst., enclosing one from Mr. Cambreleng, I have the honor to state that I dispatched the United States schooner Shark, on or about the 1st of this month, to cruise in the neighborhood of La Vera Cruz, Tampico, and Alvarado, until the 1st of March, for the protection of our commerce in that quarter, and to be relieved at that time by the United States brig Spark and schooner Weasel, which vessel sailed two days since, with instructions to scour the West Indies for piratical vessels, said to be out previous to going there.

The Spark will be relieved by the Grampus and another small schooner by the middle of May, and I shall give regular and constant protection to the persons and property of our citizens in the Gulf of Mexico, so long as I am honored with my present command, unless I receive orders from you to the contrary. I contemplate, by a constant routine, giving equal protection to our colony on the coast of Africa and guarding against the slave trade, provided it meets with your approbation.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

D. PORTER.

Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy.

Copy of a letter from Com. David Porter to the Secretary of the Navy, dated—

U. S. Ship John Adams, off Havana, April 8, 1824.

Sir: I have the honor to inform you, that, in my route to this place, I have touched at St. Bartholomews, St. Christopher, St. Thomas; examined the south coast of Porto Rico, looking in at the Dead Man's Chest and Ponce, two noted places for Porto Rico privateers; touching at Mona, St. Domingo, Beata, and Kingston, making diligent inquiries and examinations for piratical vessels, and offering convoy and protection to vessels of all nations from piratical aggressions.

In the course of this long route, although we have visited places formerly the rendezvous of pirates, and saw evidences of their having been recently there, we have not been so fortunate as to capture any, nor have we seen any vessels of a suspicious character, until two days since, when we pursued a small schooner which took shelter among the Colorados reefs, and, from every circumstance, there cannot be a doubt that she is a pirate.

I shall, as soon as I can place the vessels now under convoy in safety, hasten to Thompson's Island, to dispatch the barges and small vessels in pursuit, and hope, in a few days, to have her in possession.

It appears that an attempt has been made to revive, on the south side of Cuba, that system of piracy which had so long prevailed. The British have lost some men in attempting to suppress it, and the fortunate assemblage of a large British force at the Isle of Pines, has, I have been informed, caused a dispersion of the gang. Nothing but the presence of a strong and active force can keep them in order.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

D. PORTER.

Sir: I have the honor to transmit to you a copy of Captain Wilkinson's report of the expedition after the piratical schooner.

I shall immediately dispatch vessels to the coast of Yucatan, in pursuit of the vessel of which he gives information.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

Matanzas, May 3, 1824.

Sir: I regret extremely to learn that a bill of exchange of 5,000 dollars, drawn during my absence, by Mr. T. A. Thornton, purser, in favor of Messrs. Castillo, Black and Company, and approved by Captain Wilkinson, has been returned protested, with seven hundred dollars expenses.

My fortunate arrival with funds, enabled the drawer to take up the bill, but in consequence of this protest, the credit of Navy bills, which sold for two and a half and five per cent. premium, has greatly suffered.

I shall endeavor to do with what funds I have, and can obtain, on my own credit, until I hear that the appropriation has been made for this year.

Matanzas, May 4, 1824.

Sir: I have the honor to inform you that I have sent the Decoy to New York for stores, a list of which (copy enclosed) has been furnished to the commandant of the Navy yard.

I have also sent the Grayhound to New York to be coppered and repaired, as we have not mechanics on the station to do the work required. I beg leave to observe that a stationary force of five or six ship carpenters, ten joiners, four blacksmiths, three boat builders and twenty black laborers, could be very advantageously employed at Thompson's Island.

Such men cannot be shiped at the rendezvous; they must be got on the same terms as those employed at our Navy yards.

I beg, therefore, the Commissioners will cause me to be supplied with them.

SIR: I regret to be under the necessity of informing you, that the fever has made its appearance on the island, and that the inability of the acting surgeon's mate, in charge of the medical department there, to attend to his duty, from sickness, renders his return to the north necessary.

I have sent another to take his place, but this leaves us deplorably off for medical men.

I purpose removing the principal part of the forces to the north about the middle of next month, as the only means of guarding against the consequences of a deficiency of surgeons.

Hon. SECRETARY of the Navy.

WASHINGTON, June 25, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you, that I arrived here yesterday, in the Sea Gull, from the coast of Cuba, in nine days, and shall be prepared to return to the West Indies so soon as the season will render it safe to do so, and my health, which requires a respite from the effects of a tropical climate, will admit.

My former communications have apprised you of my intention of removing most of the vessels under my command, to the north, during the sickly season. Orders have been given by me, on the subject, and every arrangement made, to give as much protection to our commerce as the force remaining on the station will admit.

I have purposed sailing from New York, and visiting in my way out, as heretofore, the windward islands, so soon as I can get a sufficient force together, and leaving a small detachment in the nighborhood of St. Thomas, for the protection of our commerce there, where it was asked for by our merchants, when I last visited that place.

The John Adams, it is probable, will require heaving out on her return, which will be in a week or two, which will leave me with only one sloop-of-war.

As the health of Captain Wilkinson required his return, I have left Lieut. Oellers in command at Thompson's Island, with full instructions as to the duties to be performed there; and I have left all necessary orders also for the commanders of such vessels as may arrive during my absence.

The island promises to be healthy this season. I have left about sixty officers and men there; but I am sorry to say, I had only a surgeon's mate to leave to attend them during the sickly season.

I have, during this season, greatly improved the comfort and condition of the island, and thereby lessened that repugnance to remaining there, which formerly existed among both officers and men.

I shall proceed to New York, in a few days, to hasten the dispatch of the stores, for the squadron and island, which are now preparing there, and which are much required.

If there are any instructions from the Department affecting my various duties, I shall be happy to be furnished with them, as early as possible.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

SIR: I have the honor to submit to you the accompanying copy of a correspondence, on the subject of the sloop Cherub, and the vexations to which our commerce is subjected, in the Mexican port of Tampico.

I shall, as far as depends on me, endeavor to afford it every protection.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

Copy of a letter from Commodore David Porter to the Secretary of the Navy, dated—

WASHINGTON, August 9, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit you the enclosed copy and translation of a correspondence between Lieut. Commandant John Ritchie and the commandant of Tampico; and, in reply to your instructions of the 20th ultimo, requiring protection to the citizens of the United States engaged in commerce with that port, have to state that the Shark and two of the small schooners have been sent to the Gulf of Mexico, to afford the protection required.

This, under existing circumstances, is all the force which, at present, can be sent on that service. The sickly condition of some of the vessels that have returned to the United States, which has caused them to be placed under quarantine; the want of repairs in others; the revival of piracy about Cuba and elsewhere, and the reduced state of my squadron, from these and other causes, prevent my affording, with the means at my disposal, as much protection to the citizens of the United States engaged in commercial pursuits within the limits of my command, as I could wish.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, &c.,

DAVID PORTER.

HON. SECRETARY of the Navy.

WASHINGTON, August 10, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 29th ult., enclosing a copy of a letter from W. Neilson, president of the American Insurance Company of New York, complaining of the capture of the Mercator, near the port of Matanzas, when some of our vessels of war were stationed there, reflecting on the government of Cuba for permitting the seizing of "numerous and valuable vessels and cargoes, sailing under our flag," charging it with connivance or imbecility, and justifying the government for taking decisive measures for the protection of our trade. I have also received your letter enclosing an application from the merchants of Matanzas, for further protection to our commerce in that port, as well as your letter of the 28th July, enclosing a copy of a letter from the master of the brig John, of Newport, recounting the circumstance of the robbery of that vessel near the harbor of Matanzas, asserting that there were no United States vessels on that side of the Island of Cuba, and stating that there had been six captures between Matanzas and Havana. In the various letters accompanying these statements, it is enjoined on me to use my efforts, and make such disposition of the force under my command, as will render piratical aggressions, of this description, less frequent, if it is possible. The whole history of my operations, in conjunction with the authorities of Cuba, against the pirates, renders any defence of my conduct, or the conduct of those under my command, against any imputations of neglect, from any quarter, unnecessary, as it is well known to the Department that we have been devoted to the inglorious service, sacrificing health, comfort, and personal interests, for the sole object of suppressing a system of long continuance, the existence of which was disgraceful to the civilized nations whose citizens and subjects were victims to it, and which the peculiar state of the government of Cuba, arising from the various changes in Spain, and the numerous facilities to piracy, arising from the nature of the population of the island, and various other causes, originating in the suppression of the slave trade, and progress of the South American revolutions, put it out of the power of the local authorities to suppress, without aid from other quarters, which was no sooner obtained, by our presence, than the most zealous co-operation was commenced on the part of the government of Cuba, which has ever since continued, and has changed, entirely, the character of piracy from the bloody and remorseless manner in which it was conducted, to simply plundering of property, and the means from large cruising vessels, to open boats. This latter mode of carrying on their depredations, renders it extremely difficult to detect them, and is calculated to baffle the efforts of the most vigilant, from the ease with which they are enabled to possess themselves of boats along the coast of Cuba, the certainty of being enabled to escape to the unsettled coasts of the island, and the certainty, for some hours, in the early part of every day, that merchant vessels may be found, becalmed, near the land.

Nothing but resistance on the part of those who call on us for protection, can put down the present system; and from the small force employed by them, the mere show of resistance, in a few instances, is all that is required. We have seen it stated, that one of the vessels robbed was taken possession of by a boat with seven men, and plundered, the crew beaten, and confined below. Surely, sir, blame should not be attached to us, or to the government of Cuba, for the dastardly conduct of those who, with the most ordinary means of defence, which every merchant vessel affords, could permit such an act; as well might this, or any other government, be charged with imbecility, and its officers with neglect, for not detecting every highway robber, housebreaker, incendiary, or counterfeiter. The charge of imbecility must rest on those who fail to defend themselves against their petty aggressions, and the cause is attributable, almost entirely, to the parsimony of the owners, who fail to furnish a few weapons to put into the hands of the crew of vessels destined to Cuba.

Those robberies are committed most frequently by the persons employed in loading the vessels, who are well acquainted with their destitution of fire arms at the time of sailing.

I have taken the liberty of enclosing you reports from Lieutenant McIntosh, the commandant of Thompson's Island, by which you will perceive that every vigilance has been exercised by him in endeavoring to recapture the vessels taken, and punish the offenders; that at the very time that William Norris states that no United States vessels were on the north side of Cuba, the Terrier, Lieutenant Paine, and Diableta, were cruising there, and I have also to state, that the Ferret, Lieutenant Farragut, was on that coast and had been, daily, (until a few days previous,) employed in giving convoy in and out of the harbor, sometimes with his vessel, and sometimes with his small boats. I have further to state, that the John Adams, corvette, the brig Spark, the schooner Grampus, the Jackal, Weasel, and the Beagle, have, a short time since the date of Mr. Norris' letter, all visited the coasts and ports of Cuba, zealously employed in the protection of our commerce, in the performance of which duty, I regret to state, that Lieutenants Montgomery and Cumming, with several others, have fallen victims.

The reports of Captain Dallas, Lieutenant Commandants Newton, Sloat, Lee, and Zantzinger, and Acting Lieutenant Farragut, with which you have already been made acquainted, will show the arduous duties they have performed; and the report of Acting Lieutenant Pinkham, the successor of Lieutenant Commandant Montgomery, will show the result of his arduous, useful, and disastrous cruise. There is, at this time, on the coast of Cuba, and on their way there, the ships Hornet and Decoy, the schooners Shark, Wild Cat, and Terrier, and six barges; and, in a short time, the force will be augmented by the departure of others of the schooners, large and small. The charge, then, or intimation in any shape, of neglect, on the part of myself or officers, to the interest of the merchants, who have no feeling but for their own pecuniary concerns, is, as you perceive, unfounded. It is true, that warned by the dreadful mortality of last year, and by approaching disease, I left the West Indies, and ordered home the greater part of the force under my command; and the only cause of regret to me now is, that I did not remove them earlier, by which many valuable lives would have been saved, and that there should be a necessity for their return at this unfavorable season, which will undoubtedly cause the death of more.

I beg you to excuse my going so much into detail, but as the frequent applications to the Department, from the merchants concerned in the Matanzas trade, for protection, might induce the belief of neglect on my part, I have felt that this explanation is necessary.

I cannot conceal from you, however, my mortification at their conduct, after the devotion we have all shown to their particular interests, which entitled us to their warmest gratitude.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

D. PORTER.

The Hon. SAM. L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy.

WASHINGTON, October 13, 1825.

SIR: I have the honor to report to you, the arrival here of the United States schooner Fox, Lieutenant Commandant Ritchie, from the coast of Mexico, via Thompson's Island, and that she brings accounts as late as the 25th of September.

At the time of her leaving the island, no information had been received of the U. S. schooner Wild Cat, under the temporary command of Midshipman Booth, who left Havana on the 25th August, to proceed to Thompson's Island; there can be no doubt, therefore, from the violent gales experienced, of the loss of this vessel, her officers and crew.

The situation of the island was truly alarming at the last date. Four deaths had taken place the day previously, and one on the day of the report: the whole number from the 20th to the 25th, eight, including one surgeon's mate.

Should no change take place for the better, it only remains for the officer in command to remove from the island (which, from the confidence I have in his discretion, and the means he at all times has at command, in the wreckers and other vessels which daily touch there,) I have no doubt will be done, whenever he may deem it necessary.

I flatter myself with the hope of making the island more healthy next season, by the improvements at present proposed, to wit; filling up the ponds, and clearing away the woods; and if this should not succeed, the abandonment of the island must necessarily follow.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant, D. PORTER.

Hon. SECRETARY of the Navy.

WASHINGTON, October 16, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to report, in conformity with your orders of the —— December, 1823, the amount of moneys carried in the vessels under my command, since that period.

John Adams, Captain Dallas, from Tampico for Philadelphia	$70,000
Spark, Lieut. Commandant Newton, from Havana for New York	80,000
Shark, Lieut. Commandant Stevens, from Tampico for New York	102,000
Weasel, Lieut. Commandant Zantzinger, from Tampico for New York	127,000
Fox, Lieut. Commandant Ritchie, from Tampico for Havana	17,000
Fox, Lieut. Commandant Ritchie, from Tampico to the United States	3,000
Total amount,	$399,000

The average amount of freight for carrying which is 1¼ per cent.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 10, 1825.

Extract of a letter from Commodore David Porter to the Hon. Secretary of the Navy, dated—

WASHINGTON, October 22, 1824.

I have received your letter of yesterday, and shall proceed to sea in the John Adams, with the least possible delay. The ship will be at Newcastle by the time I reach there. I enclose orders for the officer who may take out the Constellation.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, Passage Island, November 15, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you, that on my arrival at St. Thomas, I was informed that Lieutenant Commandant Platt, of the U. S. schooner Beagle, who had visited Foxardo, a town on the east coast of Porto Rico, about two miles from the sea, for the purpose of making inquiries respecting a quantity of dry goods, supposed to have been deposited there by pirates, was, after being recognized as an American officer, by the proper authorities there, imprisoned and shamefully treated.

Indignant at the outrages which have so repeatedly been heaped on us by the authorities of Porto Rico, I proceeded to this place, where I left the ship, and taking with me the schooners Grampus and Beagle, and the boats of the John Adams, with Captain Dallas and part of his officers, seamen, and marines, proceeded to the port of Foxardo, where, finding preparations were making to fire on us from the battery on shore, I sent a party of seamen and marines to spike the guns, which was done in a few minutes, as the Spaniards fled on the landing of t e party. I then landed with two hundred men, and marched to the town, spiking, on the way, the guns of a small battery, placed for the defence of a pass on the road, and reached the town in about thirty minutes after landing. I found them prepared for defence, as they had received information from St. Thomas of my intentions of visiting the place. I halted about pistol shot from their forces, drawn up on the outskirts of the town, and sent in a flag, requiring the alcalde or governor, with the captain of the port, the principal offenders, to come to me to make atonement for the outrage—giving them one hour to deliberate. They appeared accordingly, and after begging pardon, (in the presence of all the officers,) of the officer who had been insulted, and expressing great penitence, I permitted them to return to the town, on their promising to respect all American officers who may visit them hereafter. We then returned to the vessels, and left the harbor, after being at anchor three hours.

As we were getting under way, a number of persons appeared on the beach, bearing a white flag, and having with them some bullocks, and a number of horses, apparently laden—no doubt a present from the authorities of the place, which they informed me they should send me.

There is no doubt that our persons and our flag will be more respected hereafter, than it has been by the authorities of Porto Rico.

Every officer and man, on this occasion, conducted themselves in a manner to meet my entire approbation.

I have the honor to be, &c.,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

WASHINGTON, March 8, 1825.

SIR: The officers named in the enclosed list will be necessary as witnesses to enable me to repel, in a suitable manner, the foul charges of Mr. Thomas Randall and Mr. John Mountain, and the injurious insinuations and assertions on the floor of Congress, against myself and the officers under my command.

Understanding that vessels, having some of them on board, are about sailing, I beg that they may be detained, provided it can be done without injury to the public service.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS.

Having been appointed to the command of the squadron, fitted out under an act of Congress of the 20th of December last, to cruise in the West India seas and the Gulf of Mexico, for the purpose of suppressing piracy, and affording effectual protection to the citizens and commerce of the United States; and to the command of all the United States ships and vessels of war in the West Indies, fitted out for the aforesaid objects, and for the suppression of the slave trade, it becomes my duty (in order that a perfect understanding may be had by those under my command of the extent of the authorities to be exercised by them in case of separation, or in case of being detached on special service) to point out briefly to them the conduct to be pursued under particular circumstances, and in doing so, shall confine myself to existing laws, and the instructions of the honorable Secretary of the Navy; and it is hoped that in no case these orders will be exceeded, without my sanction first being obtained.

First, then, with regard to piracy. On this subject there has been three several acts—that of March 3d, 1819; of May 15th, 1820; and that of the 20th December last, authorizing the additional force of schooners, &c.

The second section of the act of March 3d, 1819, authorizes "to subdue, seize, take, and send into any port in the United States, any armed vessel or boat, or any vessel or boat, the crew whereof shall be armed, and which shall have attempted or committed any piratical aggressions, search, restraint, depredation, or seizure, upon any vessel of the United States, or the citizens thereof, or upon any other vessels."

From the generality of this latter description of vessels, it would seem to embrace those of every nation or country upon which any piratical aggression may have been committed. Admitting the act might be extended thus far, it does not appear to be the general object of the law, and it was thought by the President most advisable at one time, not to give it a like indiscriminate practical construction, as to all vessels. The great object, as pointed out in the first section of the act, was to protect the merchant vessels of the United States from piratical aggression. This will, therefore be considered a particular and special duty. If, however, there shall be discovered depredations on other vessels, committed under such gross and aggravated circumstances as to leave little doubt of their piratical character, it will be a duty then to capture and bring in the aggressors. It is thought most advisable thus to distinguish in these instructions, because, among other considerations, it will be seen that, under the second section of the act, authority is only given to retake vessels of the United States, or its citizens, which may have been unlawfully captured on the high seas; no positive authority is given by it to retake the vessels of any foreign nation or country. It will also be perceived that, under this section (2d) of the act, authority is only given to "subdue, seize, and take" such vessels or boats, &c., as shall have attempted or committed some piratical aggression.

Whatever well grounded suspicions may be entertained that a vessel may have been fitted out, and is intended to be employed in such depredations, the act does not authorize her molestation, unless there is satisfactory evidence that she has either attempted or actually committed some piratical aggression on some merchant vessel of the United States or her crew, or upon some other vessel under the special circumstances above mentioned.

This, by this act, must be considered an important and leading regulation, as it will be a strong and almost controlling circumstance (considering we are at peace with all the world), in making up a judgment whether it would be safe and justifiable to treat them as pirates. Whenever, therefore, boats or vessels shall be found, the crews whereof have committed any actual violence, outrage, or depredation upon any vessels of the United States, or citizens thereof, or any other vessel, as above mentioned, it is to be sufficient to authorize their being "subdued, seized and taken," and unless it should satisfactorily appear that they were acting under some lawful authority, and not piratically, they are to be sent in for adjudication. The act of May 15th, 1820, continues in force the act of March 3d, 1819, and makes further provision for punishing the crime of piracy. The third section of this act declares as pirates any person who shall, upon the high seas, or in any open roadstead, or in any haven, basin, or bay, or in any river where the sea ebbs and flows, commit the crime of robbery in or upon any ship or vessel, or upon any of the ship's company of any ship or vessel, or the lading thereof; such person shall be adjudged to be a pirate, and the penalty death, on conviction before the circuit court of the United States.

The fourth and fifth sections make it piracy for any citizen of the United States to be engaged in the slave trade, and the penalty on conviction before the Circuit Court of the United States, death. This act is more extended than the former in its definition of the act of piracy, but in no part (except in continuing in force the former law,) authorizes capture by the armed vessels of the United States. The high and delicate power, therefore, vested in the President by the act of March 3d, 1819, which authorizes and requests him to employ so many of the public armed vessels as in his judgment the service may require, with suitable instructions to the commanders thereof, in protecting the merchant vessels of the United States and their crews from piratical aggressions and depredations, has been resorted to and exercised for the purpose of more clearly defining the duties to be performed. The trust reposed in me is one of a peculiarly delicate character; for while it is made my duty to protect our commerce against all unlawful interruptions, and to guard the rights both of person and property of the citizens of the United States, whenever it shall become necessary, it is enjoined on me not to encroach on the rights of others; and whatever discussion or collision I may have with any foreign power in relation to such rights, I am bound to conduct it with as much moderation and forbearance as is consistent with the honor of my country, and the just claims of its citizens.

The system of piracy, from whatever cause it may have originated, is of considerable extent; and from the population of the Spanish islands, which cannot enforce the authority of the government, establishments have been made by parties of those banditti in the uninhabited parts, to which they carry their plunder, and retreat in time of danger. It cannot be presumed that the government of any island will afford any protection or countenance to such robbers. It may, on the contrary, confidently be believed that all governments, and particularly those most exposed, will afford all means in their power for their suppression.

Pirates are considered by the laws of nations the enemies of the human race. It is the duty of all nations to put them down—and none who respect their own character or interest will refuse to do it, much less afford them an asylum and protection.

The nation that makes the greatest exertions to suppress such banditti, has the greatest merit. In making such exertions, it has a right to the aid of every other power, to the extent of its means, and to the enjoyment under its sanction of all its rights in pursuit of the object. In the case of belligerents, when the army of one party enters the territory of a neutral power, the army of the other has a right to follow it there; in the case of pirates, the right of the armed force of one power to follow them into the territory of another is more complete.

In regard to pirates, there is no neutral party; they being the enemies of the human race, all nations are parties against them, and may be considered as allies. The object and intention of our government is to respect the feelings as well as the rights of others, both in substance and in form, in all the measures which may be adopted to accomplish the end in view. Should, therefore, the crews of any vessel seen engaged in acts of piracy, or which there is just cause to suspect of being of that character, retreat into the ports, harbors, and settled parts of the islands, you may enter, in pursuit of them, such ports, harbors, and settled parts of the country for the purpose of aiding the local authorities or people, as the case may be, to seize and bring the offenders to justice, previous notice being given that this is the sole object. When a government exists and is felt, the local authorities must in all instances be respected, and every act must be in aid of and in co-operation with them; it being the exclusive purpose of the Government of the United States to suppress piracy, an object in which all nations are equally interested, and in the accomplishment of which, the Spanish authorities and people will, it is presumed, cordially co-operate with us.

If, in the pursuit of pirates found at sea, they shall retreat into the unsettled parts of the islands or foreign territory, liberty is given to pursue them, so long only as there is reasonable prospect of being able to apprehend them; and in no case are we at liberty to pursue and apprehend any one after having been forbidden so to do by competent authority of the local government; and if on such pursuit any pirates should be apprehended on land, they are to be given over to the proper authorities, to be dealt with according to law; and all the evidence that can be furnished, is to be given in proof of the offence alleged against them. Should the local authorities refuse to receive and prosecute such persons, so apprehended, on reasonable evidence being furnished them of their guilt, they are then to be kept safely and securely until information on the subject can be communicated to me.

Great complaints have been made to the government of the interruption and injury to our commerce, by privateers fitted out from Spanish ports; great discretion is required in giving to our vessels necessary protection against their aggressions, without infringing on the rights of the belligerents. We know not how far they have been authorized and instructed to intercept our trade with Mexico and the Colombian republic; but, according to the well settled rules of the laws of nations, the United States will not consider any portion of the coast upon the Gulf of Mexico as legally blockaded, except where a naval force is stationed sufficient to carry into effect the blockading order or decree; and our government does not recognize the right or authority of Spain to interdict or interrupt our commerce with any portion of the coast included within the Colombian republic or Mexican government, not actually blockaded by a competent force.

Hence, it is but reasonable to infer that to arrest our vessels, employed in lawful trade, from the fangs of the numerous privateers which have lately been fitted out from Porto Rico, and to "subdue, seize, take and send into any port" these depredators on our commerce, would be right and proper; but, in doing this, great discretion and prudence must be exercised, and the fact must be clearly ascertained that they come within the provisions of the second section of the act of March 3d, 1819.

By recent decisions of our courts and officers, competent to decide, and by the wording of the fifth section of the act of March 3d, 1819, it would appear that piracy may be committed by vessels legally authorized to cruise and engage in mercantile pursuits, and that the persons alone committing the act, are responsible for the same. I allude particularly to the Pancheta, sent in by the Grampus, some of the crew of which were imprisoned, to be tried for piracy, and the vessel liberated by decision of the judge; and to the Ninfa Catalina, sent in by the Spark for an act of piracy on a former voyage. The vessel and cargo, immediately on her arrival in the United States, were restored to the owners, part of the crew liberated, and those who committed the act only confined for trial. I might cite other cases to justify the opinion I entertain as to the course proper to be pursued to effect the object of our expedition, with the least possible injury to those not implicated in the crime—but these will suffice.

In the first case cited, the decision of the judge justifies the conduct of the capturing officer, and in the other case the law would seem equally to authorize her being "subdued, seized, taken," &c., &c. The language of the fifth section of the law above cited, is as follows: "And be it further enacted, that if any person whatsoever, shall, on the high seas, commit the crime of piracy, as defined by the laws of nations, and such offenders shall afterwards be found and be brought into the United States, any such offender or offenders, shall, on conviction thereof before the circuit court of the United States, for the district into which he or they may be brought, or in which he or they shall be found, be punished with death."

But it does not appear to me to be necessary, in order to the attainment of justice, that the innocent should suffer for the guilty. If the ship is not answerable for the acts of the crew, there can be no necessity or propriety in sending in the ship for adjudication; because by so doing, injury is brought on the owners, the innocent party, and to us they look for indemnity, who have no other appeal than to the liberality of our country.

But piracy must be punished, and we are bound by the second section of the act of March 3d, 1819, to "subdue, seize, and take" all vessels which commit it, and after we have done so, and it is found that the vessel committing the act is a legally authorized cruiser, the most that it would seem proper to do on the occasion, would be, to take from on board her the persons committing the act, and send them to the United States for trial.

For the same principle that would justify their capture on land, will apply with equal propriety to their seizure on board ships on the ocean, and perhaps, if any competent authority should be near at hand, it would be equally proper to deliver them up to it, with proofs of their guilt, on a pledge that they shall be brought to trial; but on a refusal to give such pledge, they must be reported to me, with as little delay as possible.

The next subject to which attention is to be directed, is the suppression of the slave trade, and it is expected that the utmost vigilance shall be exerted, in order that this inhuman practice may be put down. By the act of the 20th of April, 1818, it is made unlawful to import, or bring, in any manner whatsoever, into the United States, or the Territories thereof, from any foreign place, any person of color, with intent to hold, sell, or dispose of such person as a slave, or to be held to service.

By this act it is also made unlawful for any citizen of the United States, or other person, to build, equip, load, fit, or otherwise prepare any ship or vessel in any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, or to cause any ship or vessel to sail from any port or place whatsoever within the jurisdiction of the United States, for the purpose of procuring and transporting any such slaves to any port or place whatever; and any ship or vessel employed in such importation of slaves, or so built or fitted out or prepared, is liable to be seized and forfeited.

And by the act of third March, 1819, the President is authorized to employ any of the armed vessels of the United States to cruise in such places as he may think proper, where he may judge attempts may be made to carry on the slave trade by citizens of the United States, or residents thereof, in contravention of the acts of Congress prohibiting the same; and to instruct such armed vessels to seize, take, and bring into any port of the United States, to be proceeded against according to law, all ships or vessels of the United States, wheresoever found, which may have taken on board, or which may be intended for the purpose of taking on board or of transporting, or may have transported any person of color, in violation of any provisions of the act of the 20th of April, 1818, above referred to, or in violation of any other act or acts prohibiting the traffic in slaves. From the generality of the provisions of the slave acts, authority is given to take and bring into port all vessels of the United States which may have been in any manner employed or intended to be employed in the slave trade, or any other vessel which may be employed in the importation of slaves into the United States.

It will be observed that the first provision applies only to vessels of the United States; the second applies to vessels of every nation. The rest of the laws go to explain the manner of disposing of the slaves and persons taken in the trade, prescribe the punishment to the offenders, and the bounty to the captors.

It will be sufficient, therefore, that the capture should be made under the foregoing circumstances, and that reference should be had to me for instructions as to the disposal of the vessels, slaves, and offenders, and to the laws for a final decision.

There is one thing that must be particularly observed: it is not to be considered in these general instructions for the suppression of the slave trade, that authority is given at any place out of the waters of the United States to search, capture, or in any manner whatever to interrupt vessels under any other than the American flag.

As regards the recapture of vessels which may be found in the hands of pirates, and not belonging to the United States: although there are no laws which authorize our rescuing them from the fangs of those monsters; and, although the President has given no positive instructions on this head; still, as humanity obviously calls on us to exercise the power, having the means in our hands, (as it is a duty implied by instructions subsequently given to me, by the measures adopted for the suppression of piracy, and as it is enjoined on me by the government to harmonize and co-operate with the forces of any other power engaged in the same pursuit with ourselves, thereby showing a common interest,) I will take on myself to supply the omission, as it certainly is one, by authorizing the act whenever it may become necessary.

All vessels therefore, of any nation whatever, found in the possession of pirates, may be taken from them as though they belonged to the United States, and as though their recapture was provided for by the laws for the suppression of piracy, and by the most positive instructions of the government.

These instructions, although swelled to an unusual length, are rendered as concise as the subject would admit of, to enable me to inform you fully as to the views of the government.

We have a very delicate duty to perform; and with full confidence in the discretion of those I have the honor to command, I hope it may be fulfilled to the entire satisfaction of our country, to our own honor, and to the honor and general interest of the navy.

In time of actual warfare between nations, there can be no difficulty in discriminating between right and wrong, but the service on which we are engaged requires the exercise of our soundest judgment; and in proportion to the difficulty of discriminating will be the merit of doing what is proper.

The eyes of the world are on us, and while we must not fail in energy, we must not want in circumspection.

[Circular.]

I am directed by the honorable Secretary of the Navy, to assure the officers and men of the squadron I have the honor to command, of the consideration in which their services, on their recent expedition against the pirates of the West Indies are held, and the high sense entertained of their devotion to a most arduous and dangerous service, wherein a vigor has been displayed which has effectually arrested the depredations of the freebooters, afforded security to our trade, and justly entitles them to the unqualified approbation of the Navy Department, and the thanks of their country.

Circular to commanders of vessels in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, Craney Island, December 30, 1823.

SIR: No ship or vessel, under my command, is allowed by me to take on freight any treasure, of any description, without special instructions from me; which, when necessary and proper, will be issued in conformity with those I have received on the subject from the honorable Secretary of the Navy.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

General order.

All the small schooners, now at Matanzas and Havana, and cruising on the coast of Cuba, are to repair to this place with all possible dispatch.

(Signed) D. PORTER.

THOMPSON'S ISLAND, April 12, 1824.

Circular to commanders.

The Secretary of the Navy has been instructed by the President to inform me that it is his wish that I should not attempt to break any blockade sustained by force; but, when I am prevented from entering a blockaded place, to immediately make report thereof, with the circumstances attending it, to the Navy Department. He has also been instructed to urge upon me the cultivation of the best personal and national feelings in my intercourse with all the officers of other nations, with whom I may meet, and to enjoin the same upon those under my command.

With these wishes and injunctions you will please to comply, making, if necessary, reports to me for the information of the Secretary of the Navy.

Very respectfully your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

WASHINGTON, July 15, 1824.

Circular.

WASHINGTON, August 16, 1824.

SIR: Application has frequently been made to the Navy Department, by individuals, to give convoy to belligerent ports; and, on considering the subject, it has been deemed advisable not to confine our protection to particular cases, on the applications of individuals, but to make it of a general principle, and given to all alike. This is necessary to guard against any infringement of the rights of belligerents, as regards blockades and contraband of war; the first of which is in no case to be violated, and the second is never to be protected. Upon these principles our public ships should never give convoy to our merchant vessels to the ports of either of the belligerents without a perfect knowledge that they had no contraband articles on board, nor are they ever to be protected against a blockading force when warned off.

You will, therefore, take under your protection such vessels as may offer for convoy on your route, governing yourself by the foregoing general principles, and the orders and instructions heretofore given.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

To the COMMANDERS of the Squadron.

Extract from a general order, dated—

NORFOLK, November 8, 1823.

All the ships and vessels of the squadron under my command, now at Norfolk, are to be removed to Washington, with all possible dispatch, where their repairs, equipments and supplies are to be completed with as little loss of time as possible.

(Signed) D. PORTER.

SPECIAL INSTRUCTIONS TO DIFFERENT OFFICERS, AND THEIR REPORTS.

U. S. Ship Peacock, Thompson's Island, April 5, 1823.

Sir: You will proceed with the schooners the Fox and the Jackal, and the two cutters Gallinipper and Musquito, to examine the coast of Cuba, from Havana down to Cape Antonio, in the neighborhood of which place I expect soon to join you.

You will please to govern yourself by my general instructions, as to the course to be pursued in the pursuit of pirates.

Wishing you a pleasant and successful cruise,

I am, with sincere respect, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Captain Stephen Cassin.

Captain Cassin to Commodore Porter.

U. S. Schooner Fox, off the Havana, April 9, 1823.

Sir: Agreeably to your orders of the 5th instant, I proceeded with the schooners Fox and Jackal, and the barges Gallinipper and Musquito, off this harbor, and dispatched Lieut. Commandant Stephens, in his small boat, into the port. On his approaching the Moro, he was ordered by the guard to return, as his boat would not be permitted to enter; but that his schooner might. As it was important that we should communicate with the consul, I ordered the Jackal into the harbor for that purpose. She was suffered to pass; and returning brought an urgent request from Mr. Warner, and the entreaty of numerous merchants and ship-masters, to afford convoy to eight or ten American vessels, then ready to sail, they having been waiting a convoy a considerable time—such was the alarm created by piratical depredations, many atrocious acts having been committed in the very mouth of the harbor, and one only the evening before our arrival, by the noted schooner Pilot. Captain Stephens also informed me that this pirate was then supposed to be in Escondido, or Hidden Harbor. Under these circumstances, I thought myself justifiable in giving convoy, and sent Captain Stephens in to make known to vessels of all nations that I would afford them protection as far as the gulf, and proceed with them at daylight on the 7th.

On a belief of finding the pirates, I dispatched Lieutenant Stribling in the Gallinipper, accompanied by the Musquito, Lieutenant Kelly, of the Fox, at 7 o'clock in the evening, to Escondido. On the morning of the 8th I fell in with the Wild Cat and Beagle, who had been run off their cruising ground in chase of the pirates; but lost sight of them during the night. As it would not be detaining those vessels more than a few hours, I determined to keep them with the convoy until well off from the land, and run in myself with the Jackal and pick up the barges. At 6 o'clock on the 8th, I received a large fleet of vessels of several nations, who claimed our protection, and proceeded with them to windward. At three o'clock in the afternoon discovered the barges returning, with a stranger in company, which proved (very much to my satisfaction) to be the noted schooner Pilot, which was taken by our barges, after a long running fight; for the particulars of which, I refer you to the report of Lieutenant Stribling.

I directed the Wild Cat and Beagle to continue with the convoy until morning; the Wild Cat then to return to her station, and Beagle to return to Matanzas for your dispatches, and proceed with them to Thompson's Island. I called in the Jackal and barges, and with the prize stood in for the Moro.

As the Pilot will be of considerable importance to the expedition, I shall keep her with me, and have made the necessary arrangements, and this evening will proceed from this on my cruise.

As I believed it would have a good effect, I sent the prize into Havana, to show her, and to get a little water.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant, S. CASSIN.

Commodore D. Porter.

U. S. Ship Peacock, Allenton, April 10, 1823.

Sir: I have determined to change my plan, and go to windward with the Sea Gull and barges. You need not, therefore, be governed by my movements. I should wish for you, if your provisions will last, to go as far as Trinidada, on the south side of Cuba, where some piracies have been committed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Captain S. Cassin, U. S. Navy.

Captain Cassin to Commodore Porter.

U. S. Ship Peacock, Thompson's Island, April 28, 1823.

Sir: I had the pleasure to inform you, by a sloop from the Havana, bound to this place, on the 10th instant, of the successful beginning of my cruise, by the capture of the piratical schooner Pilot. After having shown the Pilot in Havana, and obtained a small quantity of water, I proceeded with the division to Cayo Blanco. We entered within the reef, and proceeded westward, making an average of about twenty miles per day, leaving no bay, inlet, or suspicious place, unexplored. On the 16th, a sloop boat was observed standing to the eastward. The Musquito was ordered in chase; the sloop directly altered her course for the land, was run on shore, and abandoned by her crew, who escaped into the bushes. She was found to have arms of different descriptions, shot, and other articles of a suspicious nature, which satisfied me of her piratical character; and I took possession, with an intention to destroy her, as she was rotten, and an encumbrance to us.

At 10 A. M., on the same day, we anchored in a noted harbor for pirates, intending to examine it thoroughly. Our anchor was scarcely gone before a felucca was discovered standing out for the Gallinipper, who was ahead sounding. On opening our vessels, she immediately hauled down her sails, and pulled around the point of an island. The barges were ordered in chase, accompanied by all the boats we could muster. On their getting to where the felucca had disappeared, several houses were discovered, and a number of men busily employed carrying things from them, and, at the moment, were supposed to be fishermen. It was some time before the felucca was discovered, and, when found, was dismantled and covered with bushes, hastily thrown over.

When the pirates (which they proved to be,) found she was discovered, they fired a volley of musketry at our boats, which fortunately proved harmless. The officers and crews immediately landed, and pursued them through the bushes, when a running fight of more than half a mile took place, the pirates frequently turning for a moment and firing, which was returned occasionally, but without effect, from the eagerness with which they were pursued. So closely were they pressed, that they threw off shoes, clothes, and other incumbrances; but, from the thickness of the bushes, and knowledge of their path, all made their escape. Their establishment, which consisted of five houses, was set on fire, and the felucca brought off. She is a fine boat, coppered, pulls sixteen sweeps, and is, in every respect, equal to any of our barges. She appears to have been recently fitted, and I presume was on the eve of making her first cruise. The old boat, which was taken in the morning I gave to a fisherman who was serviceable to us as a pilot, she being an incumbrance.

On the 17th we proceeded, examining all places very minutely, and from the intricacy of the navigation, did not arrive at Cape St. Anthony until the 21st. From the moment we passed within the reef until getting to the cape, we were obliged to keep the barges ahead, sounding. The vessels were all trimmed by the head, and every precaution taken, yet we frequently grounded. Many places, for several miles, we found only seven feet water, and frequently less than six, when we were obliged to run out anchors, and heave through the mud. I learned on the passage, from the fishermen, that the English attempted the same, but succeeded only part of the way. I also found the British sloop Scout cruising off the Cape, from the commander of which we learned they had numbers cruising in that quarter, and on the south side.

The passage within the Colorados, from beginning to end, I found extremely intricate; but I am much gratified by knowing we are the first who accomplished it. We suffered much for water, and the small quantity we were enabled to obtain was such as I apprehended would create disease amongst us. And, for the successful termination of the cruise, I tender to Lieutenants Commandant Stevens and Vallette, Lieutenant Stribling, and their officers, my sincere thanks.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, &c.,

S. CASSIN.

Commodore DAVID PORTER, commanding U. S. Naval Forces in the West Indies.

U. S. GALLIOT SEA GULL, Allenton, May 7, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed with the United States ship Peacock to Havana, and there complete your provisions for three months.

You will then proceed to La Vera Cruz, for the protection of our commerce in that quarter and about Tampico, where you will take on board specie on the usual freight to be transported to the United States; and when you have completed your cargo, or got all you can, you will leave there, touching at this place for further orders.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Captain S. CASSIN.

SEA GULL, May 11, 1823.

SIR: On your arrival at La Vera Cruz, you will please to correspond with Mr. John Mason, who is now in Mexico, on the subject of the transportation of specie, and act understandingly with him; moving between La Vera Cruz and Tampico, as circumstances may make necessary, and touching at such by ports as you may think proper, in order to facilitate the taking on board money.

Wishing you a pleasant and profitable cruise,

I am, with respect and esteem, your obedient servant,

D. PORTER.

Capt. S. CASSIN.

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, August 20, 1823.

SIR: I shall leave this place to-morrow morning, to look at a doubtful establishment on the continent, and shall be absent about a week, and leave you in charge of the establishment here.

I will thank you to give every aid and facility in the finishing the boat shed, and completing the repairs and equipments of the barges.

I have left all the carpenters that could be mustered. If you have any that can be spared from your ship, or any tools, such as are wanting, I will thank you to supply them, as I am very anxious to have the boats ready by the return of the Fox from the coast of Yucatan. Should the John Adams arrive, you will call on her commander to furnish all the aid in his power in effecting these objects.

All United States vessels which may arrive during my absence, are to await my return.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Capt. S. CASSIN.

PORT RODGERS, Thompson's Island, September 12, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed with the United States ship Peacock, under your command, to cruise in the Gulf of Mexico, for the protection of our commerce and the transportation of specie. You will be governed in these respects by your former instructions. You will touch at Cuba for such supplies as cannot be procured here; and on your way down you will examine the coast from Cape Catoche to Campeachy.

You will limit your stay between La Vera Cruz and Tampico to six weeks, and on your return to this place, not finding me here, you will proceed to Norfolk, reporting your arrival to me at Washington.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. PORTER.

Capt. STEPHEN CASSIN, U. S. Ship Peacock.

PORT RODGERS, Thompson's Island, September 13, 1823.

SIR: Instead of acting agreeably to my instructions of yesterday, you will proceed, accompanied by the John Adams, to Hampton Roads, as the rapid progress of the malignant fever in the squadron, for which we have not sufficient medical aid, requires that the ships should proceed where it can be obtained.

On your passage, keep company for mutual assistance.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. PORTER.

Capt. STEPHEN CASSIN, U. S. Ship Peacock.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, Norfolk, January 28, 1824.

SIR: You will proceed with the United States ship Hornet under your command, to the coast of Africa, continuing along the course in the usual track of slave trading vessels, in pursuance of the general cruising instructions, and the acts of Congress for the suppression of the slave trade and capture of piratical vessels; copies of the laws relative thereto you have enclosed.

While on the coast, you will touch at the American settlement of free colored people—communicate with the agent of the American Colonization Society—ascertain the state and condition of the colony, giving it such aid, assistance, and protection, as it may stand in need of, and be in your power to furnish.

From thence you will proceed towards the coast of Guinea, and thence in the route usually traversed by vessels with slaves, which is mostly north of the Antilles and the Keys to Cuba.

You will, in your route, touch occasionally at some of the islands of the West Indies, to obtain news of piratical vessels. You will proceed to Matanzas—fill your water and repair to Thompson's Island, where you will receive my further orders.

Wishing you a pleasant and successful cruise,

I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Capt. S. CASSIN, U. S. Ship Hornet.

SEA GULL, Allenton, June 19, 1823.

SIR: Having heard by the Jackal of the arrival of the Hornet at Havana, I have to require you to proceed to this place with as little loss of time as possible, as the services of your ship are much wanted here.

It is greatly to be regretted that you made any stay at Havana at this season, and I shall deem it particularly fortunate if your crew escape the malignant fever which has already been brought over to us in the store ship, and by which two persons who contracted it in Havana have died on the island.

You will be careful in keeping your ship well ventilated and fumigated, not to allow water to be let into the hold, or your men to be unnecessarily exposed; and, should disease appear, hasten to separate those affected from the well part of the crew.

I shall feel much anxiety until the period arrives when all apprehensions should cease, and hope no efforts will be wanting to get as early as possible beyond the baneful influence of the climate of the port.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER,

Commanding U. S. Naval Forces in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico.

UNITED STATES SHIP JOHN ADAMS, Thompson's Island, December 15, 1824.

SIR: You will please send me a report of your proceedings, from the time of your executing the orders of the Navy Department, up to the time you receive this, with a statement of the actual employment of the vessels on the station.

If the marines which were ordered to come out in the vessel with coal have arrived at Matanzas, you will send them over in the Terrier, whose commander has been ordered by me to return, after touching at Havana.

I have directed the commander of the Porpoise to repair here with his vessel; you will continue on the service you are now engaged, with the remainder of the forces, until you receive further instructions.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Capt. KENNEDY.

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, July 31, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed to Havana with the United States ship Hornet under your command, and there obtain a supply of provisions and water.

You will be careful of the health of your officers and men, suffering as little exposure to the weather, and communication with the shore, as possible, hiring boats and crews to bring off your provisions and water, and laying at Havana not one hour longer than is necessary to complete the object of your visit there.

If you should find there, or in that neighborhood, the schooner Fox, Lieutenant Commandant Ritchie, you will take her under your command, and proceed, with her in company, to a piratical establishment, said to exist at a place called New Malaga, near Cape Catoche; and ascertain, as near as possible, its state, and the force necessary to subdue it, which information you will communicate to me by the Fox, to be dispatched with it to this place. It is said that a British expedition has gone against it.

You will endeavor to ascertain how far they have made efforts to put it down, and their success.

You will from thence proceed along the coast, touching at Campeachy for information respecting the aforesaid piratical establishment, and the state of piracy on the coast; and affording, at the same time, all the protection in your power to our commerce.

From Campeachy you will proceed to La Vera Cruz, and in that neighborhood, as well as Campeachy, continue to give protection to our commerce; and, if merchants wish you to give convoy to their specie to the United States, you can afford it at the usual rate of freight.

The freight allowed at present from Havana is two and a half per cent., and this is not more than sufficient to indemnify those concerned in the risk, responsibility, and trouble of the transportation. I leave it, however, to yourself to make the best arrangement you can with the merchants, assuring them of prompt delivery, and that they may calculate on a certainty of the means of transportation being constantly afforded them.

You will write to me by every opportunity from La Vera Cruz, directing your letter to the care of Messrs. Castillo, Black & Co.; and, should you not meet the Fox, you will take the earliest opportunity of informing me by some other conveyance, of the result of your observations at New Malaga.

It is to be presumed that a stay on the coast of one month will be sufficient to enable you to make up a freight. Should you find it necessary, however, you can remain there six weeks, when you will return to this place for further orders.

Spare no pains whatever in endeavoring to preserve the health of those under your command, allowing of as little exposure to the sun as possible, and at night.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

MATANZAS, May 2, 1824.

SIR: You will proceed to Havana with the United States ship John Adams—there fill your water, and proceed to the Gulf of Mexico, touching at Campeachy, Alvarado, La Vera Cruz, and Tampico, for the purpose of affording protection to the persons and property of our citizens, and for the transportation of their specie. At one of these places you will find the United States schooner Jackal, Lieutenant Commandant John H. Lee, whom you will instruct to aid you in the duties assigned you, and, when his services are no longer necessary to you, you will direct him to take in the specie of our citizens, to New Orleans, Havana, or any part of the United States, as may be, in your opinion, most advantageous to our commercial interests. Should he go to New Orleans or Havana, he is afterwards to proceed to Thompson's Island, and, should he be sent to the United States, he is to touch there for orders from me; he is to be governed, in all cases, by the rules prescribed to you in regard to the transportation of specie, and his intercourse with foreign officers.

When you have completed your freight, which I presume may be done in one month or less, you will touch at Havana and this place for further orders.

I have read to you the instructions of the honorable Secretary of the Navy, relative to the transportation of treasures.

I have no apprehensions that you will go beyond the authority given—it is therefore needless to make any further communication to you on the subject. I will merely remark, however, that none of the vessels of war under my command must, on any account whatever, and under any inducement, be used for the purposes of commercial adventure. You can carry the treasures of our citizens from one port or place to another, and you can take it to the United States; but nothing in the shape of public advertisements must appear; and in all your intercourse with the authorities of the places you may visit, make frank acknowledgments of the motives that brought you there. Let all transactions in this respect be open, and not liable to misapprehensions. Nothing whatever in the shape of clandestine shipments must be countenanced.

Wishing you a pleasant and successful cruise,

I am, with respect, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Capt. A. J. DALLAS, U. S. Ship John Adams.

U. S. Ship John Adams, (off Matanzas,) July 16, 1824.

My Dear Sir: I have this moment received your orders for New York; all the money on board, amounting to seventy or eighty thousand dollars, is for Philadelphia, and as I have signed bills of lading to that port, I am confident you will not think I do anything improper when I go there.

Should you direct that I proceed from thence to New York, the ship will be ready the moment after the delivery of the money.

Very sincerely and respectfully,

A. J. DALLAS.

Com. David Porter, commanding West India Squadron, &c., &c., &c.

Washington, August 11, 1824.

Sir: As soon as the United States ship John Adams shall be ready for sea in every respect, you will proceed to the West Indies to give protection and convoy to our commerce, governing yourself in every respect by the general cruising instruction and the orders heretofore given.

You will make the island as far to windward as St. Barts, touching at that place and St. Thomas, and examining all suspicious places to the south coast of Cuba. You will there touch at St. Jago and Trinidad, and proceed from thence to the Gulf of Mexico, where you will cruise until a renewal of your supplies shall make your return necessary, when you will touch at Havana and Thompson's Island, to receive them and further orders.

Should you consider supplies necessary before going to the gulf, you can touch at Thompson's Island for them.

Should transportation of specie offer, you can take it on board under the restrictions laid down.

The difficulties which have recently occurred at Tampico with the commandant at that place, will make your occasional presence there indispensably necessary. Govern yourself in your intercourse with him with the utmost caution and prudence, avoiding, if possible, everything which may be likely to produce bad feelings.

You will, by every safe conveyance, make reports to me at Thompson's Island, of your proceedings.

Wishing you a pleasant cruise, I am your very obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Capt. A. J. Dallas.

Washington, October 2, 1824.

Sir: Having received orders from the honorable Secretary of the Navy to proceed as speedily as possible to Thompson's Island, in your ship, you will drop down to New Castle, ready to receive me on board, and be prepared to sail on the shortest notice.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) DAVID PORTER.

Capt. A. J. Dallas.

Thompson's Island, April 12, 1824.

Sir: With the steam galliot Sea Gull and four barges, you will proceed to give a thorough examination to the coast inside the Isabella and Colorado reef, in search of pirates.

With three of the barges, you will enter the passage at the east end, near Cayo Blanco, progessing westward, and you will send the Sea Gull and one of the barges to enter near Cape Antonio, to progress to the eastward. I shall order the Grayhound to proceed to Cape Antonio with a supply of provisions, there to await your arrival, and to receive your further instructions.

After you have executed these instructions, you will return to this place, and make to me a report of your proceedings.

Wishing you a pleasant and successful cruise,

I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Captain Jesse Wilkinson.

Copy of a letter from Captain J. Wilkinson to Commodore David Porter, Commander-in-Chief of the United States naval forces in the West Indies, Gulf of Mexico, and on the coast of Africa, communicated to the Secretary of the Navy, dated—

U. S. Steam Galliot Sea Gull, April 24, 1824.

Sir: I have the honor to report to you my return with the steam galliot Sea Gull, and four barges; having given a thorough examination of the coast of Cubâ, inside the Isabella and Colorados, keeping in search of pirates, agreeably to your orders of the 12th inst.

The Sea Gull and one barge entered at Cape Antonio, and progressed eastward, and with three barges I commenced at the river Ortigosa, and progressed westward, examining minutely every part of the coast until I met the Sea Gull with the whole of the forces.

I then proceeded to the spot designated by you for the anchorage of the Grayhound, where I arrived on the 20th instant, took in a supply of water and provisions, and sailed the same evening for Thompson's Island, with the Grayhound and Fox in company. I dispatched the Grayhound for Havana. It being calm at 7 o'clock yesterday morning, made signal for the Sea Gull to take the barges in tow, and also for the Fox to make the best of her way to Thompson's Island.

I ascertained, from several concurrent statements, that the celebrated pirate Diableto sailed from Cape Antonio about ten days previous to our arrival there, his destination unknown, but supposed to be for the coast of Yucatan, from the course he steered off, to increase his armament, having at that time but eight men, and nothing but small arms. The schooner he commanded he had captured but a short time before on the coast of Cuba.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

J. WILKINSON.

Com. DAVID PORTER, Commander-in-Chief of the U. S. Naval Forces in the West Indies, Gulf of Mexico, and on the Coast of Africa.

U. S. SHIP PEACOCK, March 11, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed down the south side of St. Domingo and Cuba to Thompson's Island, with the ships under your command, accompanied by the United States schooner Jackal.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Com. L. KEARNEY.

U. S. SHIP PEACOCK, Allenton, April 11, 1823.

SIR: So soon as the provisions of the Grayhound and Weasel can be taken on board, you will proceed with them to Havana, and give convoy every Saturday morning, as far as the Double Headed Shot Keys.

A convoy sails with the Wild Cat and Beagle, every Sunday morning, from Matanzas, and you will join them. You will have frequent opportunities of communicating with Lieut. Com. Skinner, and obtaining information of affairs to the windward of Matanzas, in the neighborhood of the Keys, about Point Yeacos, and which you will direct him to examine if practicable. Every week you will do the same with the coast between Matanzas and Havana, (on your return from convoy,) where there are several places that have been much the resort of pirates, particularly Bays Escondido and Jaruca.

If at any time you feel disposed to change stations with Lieut. Com. Skinner, you can do so, directing him to perform, with two of the vessels, the duties assigned to you.

I would recommend your going as little into Havana as possible, on account of the health of yourself and your officers and crew. Some of the small bays will no doubt supply you with water and shelter, while you are not cruising.

It will soon become necessary to careen the vessels, and get them in order. This can be done either at Matanzas or here, and probably at present more conveniently at Matanzas. You will please therefore supply yourself with the requisite stores, and take favorable opportunities of careening them, one at a time, so that you may always be in readiness for the performance of any service that may be required of you. You will consider yourself charged with the protection of our commerce to windward of Havana, while I shall use other means of protecting it to leeward.

The vessels must come here for provisions, and must always come with their water filled; but should any small supplies be required, you can obtain them from Mr. Warner, the American consul at Havana, or Mr. F. Adams, an American merchant at Matanzas. You will observe, however, the utmost economy in everything. Whenever it becomes necessary for you to leave your station, you will apprise the merchants, in order that they may make arrangements accordingly.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Com. L. KEARNEY, U. S. Schooner Grayhound.

SEA GULL, Matanzas, April 16, 1823.

SIR: In consequence of your having sent here the Weasel, and of your intentions of coming here yourself, I have sent the Wild Cat and Beagle to take your place off Havana.

I should wish to see you before my departure.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Com. L. KEARNEY.

[Extract.]

U. S. GALLIOT SEA GULL, Allenton, May 19, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed to give convoy every Sunday from Havana, examining the coast occasionally to the east and west of that port.

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Directed to Lieutenant Commanding S. KEARNEY.

SEA GULL, June 3, 1823.

SIR: The enclosed is the copy of a communication respecting a pirate on the south side of Cuba, which you will proceed in pursuit of.

You will consider yourself authorized, as circumstances may seem to make necessary, to go around the Island of Cuba, to run over the Cape Catoche, to touch at Jamaica, to extend your cruise as far as the Mississippi, and run down to Galveston; and as the object is not to restrain your permit by confining your limits, you can, if there is a reasonable prospect of meeting with pirates, extend your researches to such distance as may enable you to return to this place by the time your provisions may be expended.

Should the Jackal arrive this evening, she will probably join your command; or if you should sail before her arrival, it is likely I shall order her to join you off the south end of the Isle of Pines.

If, in the course of your cruise, you should find persons disposed to send money to the United States, you can take it on board on such freight as may be agreed on between you; and if the destination should be New Orleans, you can proceed with it direct; but if to the Atlantic States, you will, after receiving it on board, touch here for further orders.

The pursuit of pirates, is, however, the primary object, and everything else is to yield to it.

Wishing you a pleasant and successful cruise, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commanding L. KEARNEY.

U. S. STORE SHIP DECOY, Thompson's Island, April 11, 1823.

SIR: I have the honor to report to you the events of my cruise from Aguadilla to this place, accompanied by the U. S. schooner Jackal, viz:

On leaving Aguadilla, on the 12th ultimo, we proceeded off Cumberland harbor, on the south side of Cuba, and from thence along shore to the westward, looking into St. Jago, and all ports and places between that and the west end of the island (Cape Antonio), without falling in with any piratical or other vessels liable to seizure, or hearing of any piratical acts having been recently committed along that coast.

On the 23d ultimo we communicated with the British sloop-of-war Scout, then lying at anchor under the Isle of Pines, and were informed that she had tenders then cruising among the Keys and bays in that quarter, but had heard of no pirates.

On the 24th, fell in with the British armed cutter Grecian, of ten guns, off Cape Corientes; was informed that a day previous she had destroyed a piratical vessel in St. Philip's Bay, the vessel burnt, and nearly all the men killed or drowned; said to have been the only piratical vessel heard of in that quarter.

Same day, off Cape Antonio, fell in with H. M. ship Tamer, and two armed schooners, tenders, who confirmed the report of the Grecian.

On the 25th, proceeded in the Jackal back to Cape Antonio, within the reefs, without discovering any vessels or boats of any description except one or two canoes at an establishment at the Cape, where there were also some huts and Spaniards. The English boats had visited there, and some of their officers being on shore, we did not examine that place so particularly.

From Cape Antonio we proceeded along the outside of the Colorados, and close in with the reefs and coast, up as far as Havana; saw H. M. ship Hyperion, off Cape Antonio, and afterwards off the Bay of Honda, cruising also for pirates.

Under an impression that nothing remained to be done, we proceeded to Thompson's Island, giving convoy to several merchant vessels out of Havana.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LAWRENCE KEARNEY.

Lieutenant Commandant Kearney to Commodore Porter.

U. S. SCHOONER GRAYHOUND, Thompson's Island, August 10, 1823.

SIR: I have the honor of transmitting herewith, for your information, the enclosed report of the cruise of this vessel, commenced under circumstances of a vexatious nature, as the report will show, but terminating in a manner, I trust, somewhat satisfactory to you, although the principal object pointed out in your letter (respecting the pirates at the Isle of Pines) has not met that success you may have anticipated; but I have the satisfaction to inform you that, although I have not been so fortunate myself, it has been the fortune of others to apprehend those very villains who committed the outrage upon the American vessels Reuben and Eliza, and Mechanic, as mentioned in your orders. They are now in prison, at Trinidad de Cuba. Having had a communication with the governor of that place on the subject, I submit herewith my letter, with his answer (together with some publications to be seen in Spanish newspapers), for your information. Although I was not successful in getting the pirates into my possession, by the application made through the enclosed letter, and which indeed I did not expect, yet you will perceive it has drawn an official acknowledgment of these pirates being in possession of the authorities; making it a matter of public notoriety, it becomes more obligatory to pursue their prosecution to a just and proper issue.

I take this occasion to express to you the high sense I entertain of the Governor of Trinidad, which his attentions demand. He tendered us every civility and aid in his power in the prosecution of our duties; offering to procure us a pilot, and, altogether, evincing a disposition of friendly co-operation, seldom met with on the Island of Cuba.

For your better information on the subject of our visit to Cape Cruz, I beg leave to subjoin the detail of events, in a more circumstantial and particular manner than given in the enclosed report, viz:

On the 20th ult., cruising in company with the Beagle, Lieutenant Commandant Newton, Cape Cruz bearing S. E. about four leagues, brought to and examined a small armed schooner, of about thirty-five tons, having three prizes in company. She proved to be a Colombian, duly commissioned, commanded by a Frenchman, and manned by Frenchmen, and some others, apparently natives of the country where she belonged. Her commission was dated at Carthagena, last December. Her prizes were examined by Captain Newton, and found to be Spanish droggers, except one, a large canoe, calculated to carry about twenty men, which boat had been taken on shore, near the cape, where she had been abandoned by a party they supposed to be pirates, on being chased by said schooner.

On the following day, we stood in, with the Beagle in company, and anchored under the cape. Captain Newton and myself, as well for recreation as to examine the cape, landed with a small boat; but finding the walking bad, we again embarked, and proceeded along shore in search of some settlement. Soon after getting out of site of our schooners, (by doubling around the cape,) a sudden and quick fire was opened upon us, from among a thicket of mangrove bushes and rocks, with which the cape is bordered.

The party was armed with muskets and blunderbusses, which were fired around us, alternately, without effect; at the same time a firing upon us was opened from another quarter, from guns mounted on a high point of rocks a short distance ahead. Thus situated, with a cross fire upon us, enabled only occasionally to return the fire of the party in ambush, as some of them would dodge from bush to bush, or rock to rock; having for our arms but a fowling piece and one or two muskets, we were induced to return to our vessels, which we did. It being late, we waited till next day.

On the morning of the 22d, Captain Newton and myself again set off, hoisting our colors upon the boat; as it was a fair presumption that, in consequence of a Colombian vessel being on the coast, some mistake on the part of the people on shore might have been made in regard to our character. But that proved to be groundless: for, having reached within the distance of their guns, they opened upon us with more apparent spirit and determination than before, from a position inaccessible, apparently, in the rear, from the thickets of bushes and briars; and the same in front, from a precipice of rugged rocks; and, so commanding, altogether, that, to prevent the loss of lives, I directed both vessels to be warped round the cape, along an extensive reef, which almost encircles it, affording a smooth and shallow harbor. We did not succeed in getting within gun shot of the establishment, until we had reached five and six feet water, when we anchored.

Lieutenant Farragut, with the marines and some seamen, was ordered on shore, to endeavor to gain a position in their rear, to attack them, or cut off their retreat before the schooner moored, or their landing could be discovered by the pirates—as we had deemed the party we were about to attack. The officers of both schooners volunteered, and accompanied the party on shore, one being only reserved in each schooner, and a sufficiency of men for the guns, hoping to attract the attention of the pirates from Mr. Farragut's party. Several shot were fired from the schooners, which drove the pirates into places of security behind the jutting rocks, where they seemed to be in considerable force; the shot being seen to strike among the rocks behind which they sat; and not until the boats were dispatched to land in front, and Lieutenant F.'s party was close upon them, did they abandon the advantageous position they occupied. They were pursued, but with so decided a disadvantage to the pursuers, from their want of knowledge of the passes, that none, unfortunately, were taken, except two old and decrepid beings, whose age and infirmities placed them beyond the merited chastisement their more active comrades, had they fallen into our power, would have received.

A four-pounder, two swivels mounted on the heights, and some indifferent articles of small arms, were found; they, however, escaped with their muskets and blunderbusses, or else hid them in some of the numerous deep and intricate caverns to be found on the cape: in one of which, various articles of plunder were stowed, but of no value; however, enough to show the character of the wretches who infest that place; human bones were found in the cave. We found eight boats, but not of a large size; their principal one was, no doubt, the one taken by the Colombian cruiser, as before stated; and those men armed with muskets and blunderbusses were, no doubt, of her crew.

From information derived from the prisoners, we learn that the captain of the gang was in prison in the interior of the island, for having burnt an English vessel off that cape. As a singular instance of the growing propensity of the present age for piracy, I have to inform you, that even a woman and children were of this gang, belonging to the captain of them—a second "Helen M'Gregor," and the old men, too, who can do nothing else, light up the signal fire, which was done in the present instance, on our appearing on the coast.

In another case, a captain of a vessel informed me that he had been plundered by a gang of pirates, who took him by surprise, under the following stratagem, viz:

An old man, (his bald head and hoary locks exposed to view) and a little boy to steer the boat, pulled, or sailed alongside of his vessel; when it was too late, discovered that a strong party lay concealed in the bottom of the boat, to whom he had to surrender.

The female just mentioned was removed to some place of safety before the attack was made, (said to be the wife of the captain.)

Finding our pursuit of the pirates promised no success, I considered it unimportant to remain longer at the cape, having destroyed their means of doing further mischief for a time; and taking into consideration the state of our officers and men, worn down by fatigue from a long pursuit over one of the roughest countries I have ever seen, their clothes nearly torn off, from bushes of impenetrable thickness, and their shoes cut off their feet by sharp pointed rocks over which they passed, I abandoned the place, bringing off the arms, &c., of any consequence, and setting fire to everything else that would burn.

One large and well thatched house, and three smaller ones, were consumed, and a quantity of fishing nets; and their furniture, which I have always observed to be a part of the outfits of a piratical establishment; they are merely used for their immediate wants, in procuring sustenance, when their real profession proves unfruitful and obliges them to it.

I have written you a very long and full account of this affair, in order that you may be possessed of every information in my power to give, in the event of a question arising as to the propriety of landing and burning property on a foreign shore; and should this case be noticed by the supporters of "territorial jurisdiction," (over uninhabited parts of Cuba, notorious only for murder and piracy,) it will be seen that your officers and men's lives have been jeopardized, and the flag of our country made a target for the lawless villians to fire at, at their pleasure, and which will continue so to be, if any restrictions should be put upon our landing in similar places, where no authority exists than the will of the marauders themselves who inhabit those places.

I took the liberty of releasing the two prisoners, as there was no proof to establish them pirates; and I furnished them a boat, with an express condition that they should never appear again at the cape, and that I should take and treat as pirates any persons found there hereafter, not furnished with a special license from the present Captain General of Cuba, setting forth their character and occupation.

This was taking upon myself, perhaps, too much; but it is now submitted to you whether such a measure would not be proper, not only in regard to that place, but all others of a like position.

That there is a chain of intercourse with fishermen who live in such places, and pirates, I have no doubt; and it must be obvious from several cases of late.

As regards those at the Isle of Pines, they affect to know nothing of the robbery of the vessels your order mentions to me as having taken place there, although the very articles of the cargoes of those vessels I saw in their house.

At Cape Antonio, two years since, I found fishermen's huts filled with piratical goods, papers and letters, robbed from different vessels, strewed about their floors.

That fishermen, as well as pirates, should be moved from all the capes, or rather uninhabited parts of Cuba, where the proper authorities can have no control, I think necessary, and will, I hope, be the case.

Very respectfully, I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

LAWRENCE KEARNEY, Lt. Com. U. S. Navy.

Com. DAVID PORTER, Commander U. S. Naval Forces in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico.

P. S.—In my report of the affair at Cape Cruz, I forgot to mention, that we were not either hailed, or was there any colors displayed by the party that attacked us, by which we could ascertain their character.

As regards our character, they could have no great doubt: for they had seen us communicating with an English ship-of-war, close off the cape, on the same day of our arrival.

I was informed by the Governor of Trinidad, of pirates infesting the coast to the eastward of that place, and was induced to proceed within the keys in pursuit.

On my way, boarded a small schooner, belonging to the Grand Cayman Island, and the information before received was corroborated by her master.

Under these impressions, I reached Cape Cruz, and our reception there induced a belief that we had met the party complained of.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

L. KEARNEY.

Com. DAVID PORTER, Commander U. S. Naval Forces in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico.

WASHINGTON, July 8, 1824.

SIR: After executing my orders to Lieutenant Commandant T. H. Stephens, of the 25th of April last, (copy of which I enclose you,) you will fill up your provisions and stores, touch at Havana, offer convoy to vessels bound into the Gulf of Mexico, and then proceed to the coast of Yucatan—run down to Campeachy—there offer convoy and protection, and from thence proceed to Alvarado, La Vera Cruz, and Tampico, remaining in the neighborhood of those places about six weeks, giving protection to our commerce, and governing yourself in all your proceedings by my general instructions of the 26th February, 1823, which have, no doubt, been transferred to you by Lieutenant Commandant Stephens.

If, in the course of your stay in the gulf, our merchants should have specie to transport from one port or place, or to the United States, you will take it on board on the usual freight, taking special care that nothing like illicit shipments are made, and that nothing in the shape of public advertisements appear, or that anything is done liable to misconstruction, or give rise to unfriendly comments, and above all, that your vessel is not made an object of commercial speculation or enterprise. Nothing in the shape of merchandise must be taken on board, except under the circumstances provided for by the act for the better government of the navy. Let all your proceedings in these respects be open; make known frankly to the authorities of the place your objects, and let your conduct be such as to remove all suspicions.

In the transportation of specie, an object of great importance to our country, we have a delicate duty to perform, and one which very many believe is not obligatory on us; confine yourself, however, strictly to your orders, and no remarks, whether publicly or privately made, need cause you pain.

After receiving the specie on board, proceed with the convoy, if any, to Havana, thence to New York, touching, if necessary, at Charleston, to land any specie you may have for that place. After landing your specie at New York, you will return to Thompson's Island by the same route pointed out in my instructions of the 25th of April.

Wishing you a pleasant cruise, I am, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commandant JOHN GALLAGHER, New York.

Copy of a letter from Lieutenant Commandant John Gallagher to Commodore David Porter—communicated to the Secretary of the Navy.

U. S. SCHOONER SHARK, Havana, November 6, 1824.

SIR: I had the honor to address you from Thompson's Island, dated 8th September last, giving an account of our proceedings up to that date.

The wind being from the southward, and squally, we did not sail from Thompson's Island until the 10th, and arrived at the Havana on the 12th. After remaining at the Havana three days, not finding any vessels bound into the Gulf of Mexico, or desirous of convoy, we left the harbor, and stretched over for Thompson's Island, for the double purpose of landing $2,000, taken on board at Havana for Purser Thornton, (which money I was requested to land there, it being much wanted for the station,) and ascertaining if Lieut. Varnum, in the barge Gallinipper, and the schooner Terrier, had sailed on the expedition to Point Yeacos.

I arrived at the island on the 16th September, landed the specie, (Lieut. Varnum had sailed four days previous,) and sailed again on the next day, shaping our course for the Gulf of Mexico.

After arriving in the gulf we cruised about six weeks, touching off Campeachy, and communicating with the town. Not finding any American vessels here, nor hearing of any pirates or recent piracies, we proceeded to the westward, cruising from Roca Partido up with Alvarado; after which, anchored off the harbor of Alvarado, and communicated with the town, offering convoy and protection to our commerce. There being only three American vessels in port, none of which were ready to sail immediately, my further services being unnecessary at that time, I proceeded to Vera Cruz, at which place we remained at anchor three days, the Weasel in company, bound to Alvarado. There was not a single American vessel in port, consequently my services were not necessary at that place. We got under way, and cruised to the northward, as far as Tampico, where we anchored and communicated with the town, offering protection and convoy to any vessels bound out. We remained off Tampico, and in the neighborhood, ten days; from thence, cruised to the southward, and off Vera Cruz and Alvarado, but was unable to communicate with the shore, in consequence of bad weather.

The term of our cruise in the gulf having nearly expired, we shaped our course for Yucatan bank, where we cruised in sight of Alacran, and in the neighborhood, a few days, stretching off Capes Catoche and Antonio; from thence to this port, where we arrived to-day. It affords me great satisfaction to state that the officers and crew have enjoyed health since leaving New York, not having lost a man by sickness, nor have we heard a single case of malignant fever on board.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

JOHN GALLAGHER.

To Com. DAVID PORTER, commanding U. S. Squadron in the Gulf of Mexico and West Indies.

SEA GULL, Allenton, May 11, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed to Matanzas with the United States schooner Jackal, under your command, and from thence give convoy every Sunday morning, as far as the Double Headed Shot Keys, and occasionally examining on your return Key Sal, the keys to windward of Point Yacos, and the coast to leeward, for piratical vessels, and vessels engaged in the slave trade, coming under cognizance of our laws, as explained in my general instructions. Should you, at any time, be possessed of information which may be of importance to me, or letters, or packages of newspapers, and no injury will result to the public interest by your absence from Matanzas, you will please to run over to this island with them.

If, at any time, merchants should apply to you for the transportation of specie to the United States, you will please to inform me, as early as possible, as to the amount, and the time when it will be ready, in order that arrangements may be made accordingly.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commandant T. H. STEVENS.

[Extract.]

SEA GULL, Allenton, June 18, 1823.

You will proceed to Washington with the United States schooner Jackal, reporting her arrival to the honorable Secretary of the Navy, for such changes in the officers as may be necessary, and to fill up her crew—these being the objects of sending her home. When the necessary changes have been completed, she is to return to this place by the way of Crooked Island or Caucus passage, running down the south side of Cuba, examining the coast, and touching at St. Jago and Trinadada, for information respecting piracy.

It is extremely desirable that no unnecessary delay should take place in the United States, as the services of the Jackal will be wanted, and any delay will prevent my carrying into effect the arrangement of the periodical sailing of vessels from here.

(Signed by) D. PORTER.

Directed to Lieutenant Commandant THOS. H. STEVENS.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, Craney Island, December 27, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed to the Gulf of Mexico with the U. S. schooner Shark under your command, and land the two gentlemen, agents of the Bank of the United States, either at Alvarado, La Vera Cruz, or Tampico, at their option; you will then regulate your movements so as to receive on board your vessel such sums of money, in any of the ports of Mexico in the gulf, as they may designate; the money to be received on deck, and in parcels of not less than one thousand dollars, put up in good substantial boxes, barrels, kegs, or skins.

The money received from them is not to include any other than what belongs to the Bank of the United States, except on the usual terms of freight; all consignments, therefore, to the bank, and not the property of the bank, are to be taken on the terms usually given by merchants, and you will take the British rule as your guide.

When you shall have completed your freight, you will repair to Thompson's Island, for further instructions.

It is presumed that you will not find it necessary to remain in the gulf more than six weeks, and I shall endeavor to send a vessel to relieve you about the 1st of March next.

I have read to you the instructions of the honorable Secretary of the Navy, relative to the transportation of treasures. I have no apprehensions that you will go beyond the authority given; it is therefore needless to make any further communication to you on the subject. I will merely remark, however, that none of the vessels of war under my command must, on any account whatever, and under any inducement, be used for the purposes of commercial adventure. You can carry the treasure of our citizens from one port or place to another, and you can take it to the United States, but nothing in the shape of public advertisements must appear; and in all your intercourse with the authorities of the places you may visit, make frank acknowledgments of the motives which brought you there. Let all your transactions, in this respect, be open, and not liable to misapprehension. Nothing whatever in the shape of clandestine shipments must be countenanced.

For the information of the government, you will, on joining me, report to me the amount of treasures on board your vessel, where taken from, where destined, and the circumstances, terms and conditions on which you have taken them.

Should I leave Thompson's Island before you arrive there, I shall leave orders for you. During your stay in the gulf, as well as on your passage out and home, you will seek every occasion to give protection to the persons and property of the citizens of the United States.

Wishing you a pleasant and a profitable cruise, I am, sir, very respectfully,

D. PORTER.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, at sea, February 25, 1824.

SIR: After landing the specie on board your vessel at Philadelphia, you will proceed to the coast of Africa, running down as far as Cape Messurado, communicating with the public agent there, and affording every aid, assistance and protection to the colony of free blacks in your power to bestow.

Should you in your route capture any slave vessels, you will deliver them to the agent appointed by the government to receive them.

From thence you will run for the coast of Guinea, and continue down the coast of Venezuela, thence to Jamaica, and from thence to Havana and Thompson's Island, where you will receive my further orders.

In this route you will seek every occasion to afford such protection to the persons and property of our citizens as may be in your power, and for this purpose you may touch at such places where it is most likely such protection may be required.

You will carry, according to the prescribed rules, the specie of our citizens from one port or place to another.

You will be governed by the laws for the suppression of the slave trade, and by my general cruising instructions, as regards the duties you have to perform.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

U. S. Ship John Adams, Thompson's Island, April 25, 1824.

Sir: You will proceed to Charleston and New York, and deliver the specie on board your vessel; you will then return with all possible expedition to this place, touching at St. Barts, St. Thomas and Matanzas, for information respecting piratical vessels, &c.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Lieut. Com. Thos. H. Stevens.

U. S. Ship John Adams, February 14, 1824.

Sir: Observing in the public prints your arrival in New York, I have to direct your return to Thompson's Island, with all possible dispatch, by the way of Caycos or Crooked Island passage, and round the south side of Cuba, looking into Cumberland harbor, St, Jago, Cape Cruz, Trinidada, Isle of Pines, &c., &c. You will be governed by the general cruising instructions, as regards the duties to be performed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commanding James P. Oellers, U. S. Schooner Jackal.

U. S. Ship John Adams, Norfolk, January 24, 1824.

Sir: You will proceed with the United States schooner Grampus under your command to the coast of Africa, continuing along the coast in the usual track of slave trading vessels, in pursuance of the general cruising instructions, and the acts of Congress for the suppression of the slave trade and capture of piratical vessels; copies of which, and of the laws relative thereto, you have enclosed.

While on the coast, you will touch on the American settlement of free colored people, communicate with the agent of the Colonization Society, ascertain the state and condition of the colony, giving it such aid, assistance, and protection, as it may stand in need of, and be in your power to furnish.

From thence you will proceed towards the coast of Guinea, and thence in the route usually traversed by vessels with slaves, which is most north of the Antilles, and the keys to Cuba. You will, in your route, touch occasionally at some of the islands of the West Indies, to obtain news of piratical vessels; but you will endeavor to reach Matanzas, fill your water, and repair to Thompson's Island by the middle of May, where you will receive my further orders.

Wishing you a pleasant and successful cruise, I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commanding John D. Sloat.

U. S. Steam Galliot Sea Gull, Matanzas, May 20, 1824.

Sir: I have received yours of yesterday, communicating your proceedings, in conformity with my instructions of the 24th January, which is highly satisfactory, and shall be laid before the Hon. Secretary of the Navy, for his information, and for the information of those interested in the establishment at Cape Messurado.

After filling your water and obtaining your supplies of provisions, you will touch at Havana, and take under convoy vessels bound to the Gulf of Mexico, run down on the coast of Yucatan, touch at Campeachy, thence to Alvarado, Sacraficio, La Vera Cruz and Tampico, giving every protection in your power to the persons and property of American citizens, and convoy to vessels of all nations against piratical aggression.

After remaining in the Gulf about six weeks, you will proceed to Havana, and from thence to New York, and you are permitted to receive on board the gold and silver of our merchants at the same rate of freight as is charged by British sloops-of-war; but you will be particularly careful that nothing like clandestine shipments take place, and that nothing in the shape of merchandise be permitted to come on board; for, although it is the desire of the Navy Department that every facility be given to our merchants to get their specie from one port or place to another, it is strictly forbidden that our ships should become objects of commercial speculation and enterprise; in other respects, let all your transactions be open, and not subject to misconstruction, and in conformity with the orders of the Secretary of the Navy. You will, on your arrival at New York, make to me a written report of the sums brought in your vessel; the place or places taken from, where landed, and the rate at which it was taken on freight.

Wishing you a pleasant cruise, I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Com. John D. Sloat, U. S. Schooner Grampus.

Extract of a letter from Lieutenant Commandant John D. Sloat to Commodore David Porter, commanding the United States naval forces in the West Indies, Gulf of Mexico, and coast of Africa, communicated to the Secretary of the Navy, dated—

U. S. SCHOONER GRAMPUS, Matanzas, May 29, 1824.

SIR: In conformity to your orders of the 24th January, 1824, I sailed from Hampton Roads on the 28th February, and proceeded to the coast of Africa. On the 4th of April I anchored at Cape Mesurada, and visited the colony of free people of color, where I remained eight days, and have the satisfaction to report that I found them comfortably settled, and at peace with all the neighboring nations; although they appprehend that the tribe they had the difficulty with previous to the visit of the Cyane is not friendly to them, yet they do not believe they will venture to attack them again, particularly since my visit, as I gave the natives to understand that I should return there shortly, and they know that I supplied the colony with ammunition, provisions, &c., &c., a return of which I enclose. The appearance of the Grampus on the coast has been of essential service to the settlement. The trade with the natives in their immediate vicinity had been stopped for some time; but when they found the Grampus to be a vessel of war, the King sent in word that he would open the trade, and before I left there the natives began to come in with provisions and other articles, in considerable numbers. The agent for the United States, as well as for the Colonization Society, had left the settlement some time before my arrival; they have appointed acting agents, Mr. Waring for the United States, and Mr. Johnston for the society, both colored men. By their advice the people have elected a council of twelve to assist in managing the affairs of the colony, and by what I could discover, they appear to be doing very well, but they are extremely desirous to have the advice of good agents; they say they do not yet feel themselves competent to manage the establishment. Their settlement is very pleasantly situated on a narrow peninsula, the sea on one side, and Mesurada river on the other, on high ground; and they have for its protection a tolerably good fort, built of stone, at one end of the village, on which are mounted, at present, one long eighteen-pounder, and two eighteen-pound gunades; at the other extremity is a block-house, with one nine-pounder and one six. They have also mounted one brass four-pound field piece and one two-pound swivel, besides several other guns not mounted, and about one hundred muskets, eighty of which are in good order, and the others they will be able to repair with the tools and materials I gave them. The number of inhabitants is two hundred and thirty-seven; seventy-eight of them capable of bearing arms, who are formed into a company, and muster for exercise every Saturday. They have all very good houses, and some of them begin to cultivate gardens; they have also cleared a considerable piece of ground intended for cultivation. They catch in the river a variety of fish, and plenty of oysters. They have an abundance of fine timber, and the soil is very good; and they all appeared to be quite contented with their situation. They probably enjoy as good health there, as they would in any part of the world. Of the last emigrants, one hundred and five, all have gone through their seasoning; three young children only have died, and they with complaints incident to every climate and country. I have made this detailed report, believing it would be agreeable to you, to the society, and to all those friendly to the settlement, to know exactly how these people are situated, as I have been informed at St. Thomas that there are very discouraging reports in circulation in the United States. We sailed from thence on the 12th of April, and I am sorry that I am obliged to add, on the eighth day several cases of malignant bilious fever occurred on board, three of which proved fatal. A particular description of the character and progress of the disease, by Dr. Halse, I beg to enclose. No person has been permitted to go on shore except when necessity required it, and no persons were attacked with this disease except those who had been thus exposed. After leaving Cape Mesurada, I beat up the coast to the northward of Rio Grande, but did not meet with any vessels coming within the limits of my instructions. From there I proceeded in the execution of your further orders, and, on the 10th of May, anchored at Martinico, to obtain information, fill my water casks, and obtain other supplies, all of which were nearly exhausted. Sailed thence on the 16th, and anchored at St. Bartholomew on the 18th; sailed again on the 19th, and anchored at St. Thomas on the 20th; sailed thence on the 21st; called off St. Johns, Porto Rico, on the 22d, and communicated with the American consul. The next day I stood close in to the town of Aguadilla, where I found a Dutch man-of-war brig; communicated with the commander, who informed me that he had been there some days, and had not heard of any piracies or suspicious vessels in the Mona passage lately. Remained in the Mona passage all night, and then made the best of my way to the Island of Cuba.

I have examined the north coast closely as far down as Sugar Key, where I anchored in consequence of seeing several tents on the key. I, however, found them to be the crew of a Spanish brig-of-war from Cadiz, cast away there twelve days previous. From there the weather did not permit me to approach the keys along the Cuba shore. I examined Ginger Key, but found no person there, nor any indication of any having been there recently.

I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

JOHN D. SLOAT.

To Com. DAVID PORTER, commanding U. S. Naval Forces in the West Indies, Gulf of Mexico, and Coast of Africa.

WASHINGTON, August 16, 1824.

SIR: It has been intimated to you, that the Grampus, under your command, could be ordered to give convoy to certain vessels from the port of New York to Carthagena, but on a reconsideration of the subject it has been deemed advisable and prudent not to confine our protection to particular cases, on the application of individuals, but to make it of a general nature, formed on general principles, and given to all alike. This is necessary, to guard against any infringements of the rights of belligerents as regards blockades and contraband of war, the first of which is in no case to be violated, and the second is never to be protected. Upon these principles, our public ships should never give convoy to our merchant vessels to the ports of either of the belligerents, without a perfect knowledge that they had no contraband articles on board, nor are they ever to be protected against a blockading force when warned off.

Under these considerations, you will sail, in execution of my orders of this date, taking under your protection such vessels as may offer for convoy, as far as your route may extend, governing yourself by the foregoing general principles, and the orders and instructions heretofore given.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant, J. D. SLOAT, U. S. Schooner Grampus, New York.

WASHINGTON, Augvst 16, 1824.

SIR: You will proceed to the West Indies with the United States schooner Grampus under your command, touching at St. Bartholomew and St. Thomas, and remain, until further orders, in the neighborhood of these places, and about Porto Rico, for the protection of our commerce, with such of our small vessels as may be ordered there. Some piratical acts having been committed in the Sail Rock and Mona passages, you will endeavor to prevent them in future.

In the duties to be performed, and in your intercourse with foreign officers, you will be governed by the general sailing instructions and orders heretofore issued.

Should supplies be required for your vessels, before my arrival, you will make application to Mr. Furnace, an American merchant at St. Thomas, who has offered to furnish them.

The schooner Beagle, Lieutenant Commandant Platt, has been ordered on the same service with the Grampus. You will make to me frequent reports of your proceedings, directing your letters to Washington, under cover to the Secretary of the Navy.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commandant J. D. SLOAT.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, Passage Island, November 15, 1824.

SIR: After you have landed the Pilot at St. Thomas, and executed my orders of this date, relating to the men in confinement at St. Christopher, you will return to St. Thomas, and continue your protection to our commerce, in conformity to former orders.

It has been stated to me by American merchants at St. Thomas, that large amounts of American property are frequently passing from that place to the coast of Comana Caraccas and Pensacola, for which they have asked protection. You will afford it to them when, in your opinion, it can be done advantageously to the public interest, and you are authorized to carry for them their specie, under former regulations and restrictions.

The Beagle will continue with you on this station, and you will make such disposition of your forces as will be most beneficial to the interest entrusted to you.

Should anything of importance occur, which it may be necessary that I should be informed of, you can, if no opportunity offers to Havana or Matanzas, send the Beagle with your communications to Thompson's Island.

You will continue to procure from Mr. Furnace, for your vessel, as well as the Beagle, the supplies which may be necessary; but, in doing so, you will observe the utmost economy. Payments can be made as heretofore, by drafts on the Secretary of the Navy.

Should any supplies be required at St. Bartholomew, you will obtain them from Mr. Bailey, a merchant of that place, who has offered to furnish them. At every opportunity you will inform me of your proceedings.

Your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant J. SLOAT, U. S. Schooner Grampus.

U. S. SHIP PEACOCK, St. Thomas, March 3, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed with the Shark, under your command, accompanied by the Ferret, Terrier and Weazel, down the south side of Porto Rico, acting in conformity with my general instructions of the 26th.

You will continue to cruise in the neighborhood of Aguadilla at the west end of the island, detaining until my arrival there all vessels which may have committed any act of piracy on our commerce.

On your way down give the coast thorough examination, and look into Cat Island.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant MATTHEW C. PERRY, commanding U. S. Schooner Shark.

U. S. SHIP PEACOCK, at Aguada, March 11, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed with the United States schooner Shark, under your command, to the coast of Caraccas, touching at Porto Cabello and Laguira, to ascertain whether there are any interruptions to our commerce in that quarter; and if there should be, you will give it such protection as may be in your power.

By an official dispatch from the Captain General of Porto Rico, I am informed that the blockade of the coast of Colombia is raised, except against munitions of war; and the enclosed copy of a list of priva-teers, fitted from Porto Rico, will aid you in identifying the character of those you may meet in your cruise.

From thence you will proceed down the coast, touching at the various places, wherever it may be found necessary, until you get to La Vera Cruz, in which neighborhood you will remain for the protection of our commerce until it may be necessary for you to rejoin me, which will depend on your provisions and supplies.

If, in the course of your cruise, you should find persons who have money to send to the United States, you will take it on board, agreeing with them as to the amount of freight; and while you remain at or about La Vera Cruz, you will please to communicate with Mr. John Mason, in Mexico, who is Secretary of American Legation there, on the subject of moneys to be transported to the United States, giving him information of your movements, that his arrangements may be made accordingly.

On leaving La Vera Cruz, you will proceed to Thompson's Island for my further instructions.

I should wish to be apprised of the time when it would be likely that you would leave La Vera Cruz, sufficiently early for me to send a vessel to relieve you.

With great respect, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commandant M. C. PERRY.

SEA GULL, Allenton, June 24, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed off Havana with the schooner Shark, under your command, and there offer convoy to vessels bound to the United States; from thence you will proceed to New York, there to land the specie, discharge the men whose times are out, as well as those who have but a short time to serve, and to cause the necessary repairs to be made to your vessel with all expedition, that she may return to this station with the least possible delay.

With great respect, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commandant M. C. PERRY.

SEA GULL, Allenton, June 24, 1823.

SIR: Understanding as you do my views with regard to the service to be performed in these seas, it is my wish, should you return in the Shark, that her protection to the commerce of the United States, on her way here, should take a range equal or nearly so to the round recently taken; but should her commander be changed for one who has not served under my command on this expedition, it is my wish that she should return here by the shortest route, in order that I may give him his instructions.

Should you leave the Shark, you will furnish your successor with a copy of this letter for his government.

With great respect, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commandant M. C. PERRY.

U. S. SHIP PEACOCK, Matanzas, March 29, 1823.

SIR: You will, with the United States schooner Wild Cat, accompanied by the Beagle, remain to give protection to the American commerce in this quarter, and afford convoy every Sunday as far as the Double Headed Shot Keys. There is a bay to the windward of this place, and around Port Yeacos, called Sequappa Bay, which has been the resort of pirates. I wish you to embrace the first opportunity to visit it; but don't let your visit interfere with your convoy.

Any supplies that may be wanted for the two schooners you will obtain through the agency of Mr. L. Adams, a merchant of this place. You will be careful in not obtaining any but such as may be absolutely necessary.

Any intelligence you may receive of sufficient importance to make it necessary that I should be made speedily acquainted with it, you will convey to me as early as possible by one of the schooners. She will find me at Thompson's Island.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant C. W. SKINNER, U. S. Schooner Wild Cat.

SEA GULL, Matanzas, April 16, 1823.

SIR: Proceed with the Wild Cat and Beagle, to give convoy from Havana next Sunday morning, after which, go to Thompson's Island, take in one month's provisions, and return to Havana, to give convoy every Saturday. Should you meet the Grayhound, inform the commander of my being here, and my wish to see him.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commandant C. W. SKINNER.

SEA GULL, Allenton, May 19, 1823.

SIR: As soon as you are relieved by the Grayhound, you will fill your water and proceed to this place with the Wild Cat and Beagle, that they may undergo the necessary repairs.

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Directed to Lieutenant Commandant C. W. SKINNER.

SEA GULL, Allenton, June 18, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed to Havana, and deliver the letter bag of the Wild Cat to Messrs. Castillo, Black & Co., informing them you will leave there for the United States, on the 1st of July. You will then offer convoy, proceed to Matanzas, leave a letter bag with Messrs. Latting & Co., informing them you will sail on the 28th.

You will offer convoy from Matanzas, take in specie, return to Havana, take in specie from there for the United States, and return here for further orders, leaving Havana on the 1st of July.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commandant C. W. SKINNER.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, June 19, 1824.

SIR: Circumstances have rendered it necessary to give to your cruise a direction which was not intended or anticipated, until within two or three days past.

You will receive such orders from Captain Kennedy as he shall transfer to you, relating to his cruise on the coast of Africa, and you will obey them, as if directed to yourself.

On Wednesday next, the Rev. Mr. Gurley will leave this, and on his arrival at Norfolk, you will receive him on board, and proceed without delay to the coast of Africa, touching at Cape Mesurada, and following, thence, the directions in your orders. It will probably be necessary for you to remain at the cape eight or ten days, in order that Mr. Gurley may accomplish what he is directed to do. He will return with you to the West Indies, where you will report to Commodore Porter. Mr. Gurley will return thence to the United States by the first opportunity.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

SAM'L L. SOUTHARD.

Lieutenant CHARLES W. SKINNER, commanding U. S. Schooner Porpoise, Norfolk, Va.

Copy of a letter from Lieutenant C. W. Skinner, commander of the United States Schooner Porpoise, enclosing copies of the correspondence referred to in the letter.

UNITED STATES SCHOONER PORPOISE, Matanzas, October 24, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that, after leaving the convoy from Havana, I stretched in for this port, where I anchored on the evening of the 18th. On inquiry, I was informed no piracies had been recently committed in this vicinity. I, however, determined to dispatch the boats secretly from the harbor, and examine the adjacent bays and inlets. On the night of the 19th, I placed them under command of Lieutenant Hunter, and Acting Lieutenant Johnson, with orders to examine about Point Yeacos, Sewappa Bay, and Camrioca, places long notorious as a retreat for pirates. On the evening of the 22d, Lieutenant Hunter returned with a piratical schooner of one carriage gun, one new American cutter, and two other boats; one, having three men on board, he captured in Sewappa Bay. Every appearance justified the suspicion of piracy. The persons informed Lieutenaut Hunter their vessel had been taken by armed men; the boat they were in, given in exchange, with a promise of returning in a few days and restoring their vessel. The next day, off Camrioca, Lieutenant Hunter discovered a suspicious schooner standing to sea, in chase of a vessel in sight. On his approach, the schooner tacked, and made for the shore, closely pursued by the boats. The crew abandoned the vessel, and fled to the woods, where they were sought for in vain; she proved to be a pirate, mounting one gun, and small arms. From the number of nautical instruments, trunks of clothing, rigging, and sails, with three sets of American colors, found on board, she must have robbed several vessels. From stains of blood on the clothes, and other articles on board, I fear the unfortunate persons to whom they belonged must have been murdered. No papers were discovered which could lead to the name of the vessel or vessels captured; several articles of clothing were marked "Captain Shaw," a number with the initials "A. S." A bag on board was lettered "brig Morning Star's letter bag." One waistcoat contained in the pocket a printed card, "Mr. M. Loris' boarding house, Charleston, South Carolina," and appeared to have been newly printed. A medicine chest on board was put up in New York. I have delivered the prisoners to the Governor of Matanzas, and shall furnish him all the testimony in my power which can throw light on their character. The schooner I sent out last night, under command of Acting Lieutenant Brown, in hopes of decoying some of her former comrades. I sail with convoy to-morrow, and after joining the prize at sea, shall proceed to Thompson's Island for supplies, and return to the protection of commerce on this coast. I trust, sir, should the prize be sufficiently fortunate to meet with pirates, I shall have the pleasure to give a satisfactory account of them.

I do myself the honor to enclose the correspondence relative to the capture of the vessels and prisoners.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

CH. W. SKINNER.

To the Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy, Washington City.

U. S. Ship John Adams, Thompson's Island, December 22, 1824.

Sir: You will proceed to Havana, where you will complete your provisions and stores, offer convoy to vessels bound into the Gulf of Mexico, and then proceed to the coast of Yucatan, run down to Campeachy, there offer convoy and protection, and from thence proceed to Alvarado, La Vera Cruz, and Tampico, remaining in the neighborhood of those places about six weeks, giving protection to our commerce, and governing yourself in all your proceedings by my general instructions of the 26th of February, 1823.

If, in the course of your stay in the gulf, our merchants should have specie to transport from one port or place, or to the United States, you will take it on board on the usual freight; taking special care that nothing like illicit shipments are made, and that nothing in the shape of public advertisements appear, or that anything is done that may be liable to misconstruction, or give rise to unfriendly comments; and above all, that your vessel is not made an object of commercial speculation and enterprise. Nothing in the shape of merchandise must be taken on board, except under the circumstances provided for by the act for the better government of the navy. Let all your proceedings in these respects be open; make known frankly to the authorities of the place your objects, and let your conduct be such as to remove all suspicions.

In the transportation of specie, an object of great importance to our country, we have a delicate duty to perform, and one which many believe is not obligatory on us. Confine yourself, however, strictly to your orders, and no remarks, whether publicly or privately made, need cause you pain.

After receiving the specie on board, proceed with the convoy, if any, to Havana, where you will await for further orders.

Respectfully, your obedient servant, D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant Chas. W. Skinner, U. S. Schooner Porpoise.

U. S. Ship John Adams, Norfolk, January 25, 1824.

Sir: When the U. S. schooner Porpoise shall have obtained a new crew, and received the necessary repairs, you will proceed with her to the coast of Africa, continuing along the coast in the usual track of slave-trading vessels, in pursuance of the general cruising instructions, and the acts of Congress for the suppression of the slave trade and capture of piratical vessels; copies of which, and of the laws relative thereto, you have enclosed.

While on the coast you will touch at the American settlement of free colored people; communicate with the agent of the Colonization Society; ascertain the state and condition of the colony—giving it such aid, assistance and protection, as it may stand in need of, and be in your power to furnish.

From thence, you will proceed to the coast of Guinea, and thence in the route usually traversed by vessels with slaves, which is mostly north of the Antilles and the keys to Cuba. You will, in your route, touch occasionally at some of the islands of the West Indies, to obtain news of piratical vessels; proceed to Matanzas, fill your water, and repair to Thompson's Island, where you will receive my further orders.

Wishing you a pleasant and successful cruise, I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,
D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant Skinner.

U. S. Galliot Sea Gull, Havana, January 23, 1825.

Sir: On your return to this place, from the Gulf of Mexico, should you have upwards of one hundred thousand dollars on board, for the United States, you will proceed with it to the most convenient port, land it, take in the necessary supplies for your vessel, and return to Thompson's Island.

Should you not have so large an amount on board, you will, after landing it here, proceed to Thompson's Island for further orders.

Very respectfully,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant C. Skinner, U. S. Schooner Porpoise.

Sea Gull, Port Rodgers, June 12, 1823.

Sir: You will receive herewith eleven letters from the Captain General of Cuba to the military governors of Taraco, Bayamor, Gilaca, Batabano, Puerto Principe, Jaqua, Baracoa, Halquin, St. Juan de los Remedios, Trinidad de Cuba, and one from me to the admiral at Jamaica.

You will proceed with the United States schooner Beagle to deliver the above-mentioned letters, and, at the same time, keep in view the suppression of piracy.

It is my intention, on your return to this place, which must be within two months, to send your vessel to the United States. You will, therefore, take on board such sums of money as merchants may wish to ship in her, and on such terms of freight as you may think proper to establish with them.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant John T. Newton.

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, September 1, 1823.

SIR: On your way to the United States, you will touch at Havana, and deliver the accompanying letters, receive such letters as the merchants may wish to send by you, and should specie be offered by them for the United States, you will take it on board at the usual freight.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant JOHN T. NEWTON.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, January 13, 1824.

SIR: You will proceed to sea with the U. S. brig Spark and schooner Weasel, under your command, touch at St. Bartholomew and St. Thomas for information; run down the south side of Porto Rico, examine the Mona passage and Island of Mona; continue down the south side of St. Domingo, keeping well in shore; and from thence down the old Straits of Bahama to Matanzas, where you will land Dr. Anderson.

There have been two armed vessels carried off by their crews lately, one a ship from St. Bartholomew, belonging to the Colombian government, the other a brig belonging to Porto Rico, and they have both turned pirates.

The ship was called the Oronoke, formerly commanded by a Captain Nutter, but ran away with by the boatswain's mate (Wilson, an Englishman, with black hair and whiskers, grey eyes and a long, narrow face) and sixty of her crew.

Part of the officers were forcibly carried off and probably murdered. She is a black ship with a yellow streak, American sharp built, shows sixteen guns, low in the water, and sails fast; mast-head and spars painted white.

The brig was called the Scipio, and was carried off by sixty of her crew, from Margagues, Porto Rico. It is said she has plundered several vessels in the Mona passage.

Two small piratical vessels, sloop rigged, with pivot guns, have lately plundered the brig William Henry, Captain Lester, at the Island of Mona, where it is stated there is an establishment formed by the piratical population from Porto Rico, and it has been suggested that it would be the most certain means of capturing and destroying them to take possession of and destroy all the boats that can be found there, and thus cutting off their retreat; of this you can better decide when you get there.

It is said they are well armed, and supplied with provisions and ammunition. It is not improbable that you will find plunder deposited there; there is good anchorage on the west side.

After you leave St. Domingo, send the Weasel to Jamaica, with the enclosed letter for Commodore Sir Edward Owen; from thence around the west end of Cuba to Thompson's Island, to fill up your provisions; run down the coast of Yucatan, touch at Campeachy, and there offer protection and convoy to our vessels.

After executing these orders, you will then govern yourself by No. 2, herein enclosed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commandant JOHN T. NEWTON, U. S. Brig Spark.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, January 13, 1824.

SIR: On your arrival at Campeachy, and after obeying my orders No. 1 of this date, you will proceed to Alvarado, Tampico, and La Vera Cruz, at one of which places you will in all probability find the U. S. schooner Shark, Lieutenant Commanding Stevens, who is there for the purpose of protecting the commerce of the United States, and giving conveyance to specie to this country.

You will open a correspondence with two of the agents of the Bank of the United States, now in Mexico, Messrs. Andrews and Crawford, and regulate your movements so as to receive on board your vessel such sums of money in any of the ports of Mexico, in the gulf, as they may designate; the money to be received on deck, and in parcels of not less than one thousand dollars, put up in good, substantial boxes, barrels, kegs or skins.

The money received from them is not to include any other than what belongs to the Bank of the United States, except on the usual terms of freight. All consignments, therefore, to the bank, and not the property of the bank, are to be taken on the terms usually given by merchants, and you will take the British rule for your guide.

When you shall have completed your freight, you will repair to Thompson's Island for further instructions. It is presumed that you will not find it necessary to remain in the gulf more than six weeks, and I shall endeavor to send a vessel to relieve you about the 1st of May next.

I have read to you the instructions of the honorable Secretary of the Navy, relative to transportation of treasures. I have no apprehension that you will go beyond the authority given; it is therefore needless to make any further communication to you on the subject. I will merely remark, however, that none of the vessels of war under my command must, on any account whatever, and under any inducement, be used for the purposes of commercial adventure. You can carry the treasure of our citizens from one port or place to another, and you can take it to the United States, but nothing in the shape of public advertisements must appear; and in all your intercourse with the authorities of the places you may visit, make frank acknowledgments of the motives which brought you there. Let all your transactions in this respect be open and not liable to misapprehension. Nothing whatever in the shape of clandestine shipments must be countenanced.

For the information of the government you will, on joining me, report to me the amount of treasures on board your vessel, where taken from, where destined, and the circumstances, terms and conditions on which you have taken them.

Should I leave Thompson's Island before your arrival there, I shall leave orders for you. Should I send one of the small schooners to assist in the performance of your duties, you will enjoin on her commander the precautions to be observed in taking on board specie.

During your stay in the gulf, as well as on your passage out and home, you will seek every occasion to give protection to the persons and property of the citizens of the United States.

Wishing you a pleasant and profitable voyage, I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Com. JNO. T. NEWTON, U. S. Brig Spark.

WASHINGTON, July 12, 1824.

SIR: Understanding, from information communicated to me by the Secretary of the Navy, that the brig Spark, under your command, has arrived at the quarantine ground, New York, you are hereby required to have her got in readiness for sea as soon as practicable, and it is hoped she will be ready to sail about the middle of August.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Com. JNO. T. NEWTON.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, April 27, 1824.

SIR: After landing what money you may have on board for Havana, you will proceed to New York, with such as you may have in for the United States, and as soon after the delivery of the same as possible, you will return to Thompson's Island, touching on your way at St. Barts, St. Thomas and Matanzas. Should you find no orders here, you will proceed to the Gulf of Mexico, and act in conformity with the course prescribed to you in my letter of January 13, 1824, No. 2.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Com. JNO. T. NEWTON.

U. S. SHIP PEACOCK, Allenton, April 12, 1823.

SIR: The two schooners, the Terrier and Ferret, are to be got ready for sea as soon as possible, and so soon as Captain Cassin returns from his cruise, you will proceed with them to Cape Antonio, and remain in the neighborhood of that place, until a renewal of your supplies makes your return here necessary.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Com. R. M. ROSE, U. S. Navy.

U. S. STEAM GALLIOT SEA GULL, Matanzas, May 4, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed to sea with the two schooners, and give convoy as far as the Double Headed Shot Keys, if necessary, thence to Key Sal, then across to the keys to the windward of Point Yeacos, down the coast of Cuba to Cape Antonio, around to Trinidada, on the south side, and if your provisions will hold out, and there should be no necessity for your continuance in that neighborhood, you will make the circuit of Cuba, returning to Thompson's Island by the way of the old Straits of Bahama, giving every suspicious place a thorough examination.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Com. R. M. ROSE.

Lieutenant Commandant R. M. Rose:

There has been a report of piracy at or near Keytaca. Captain Rose will proceed there and ascertain the grounds of the report, taking with him the Midge, under the command of Lieutenant Boughen, and act according to circumstances.

It will be desirable to proceed to-night or to-morrow morning, early, and to work up inside the reef.

(Signed) D. PORTER.

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, June 18, 1823.

SEA GULL Allenton, July 1, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed to Havana, land the two Spaniards, deliver to the captain general the accompanying package, and offer to bring over any claimant of the detained property who may wish to come.

You will place the letter bag of the Terrier in the counting-house of Messrs. Castillo, Black, & Co., informing them you will leave there, for the United States, on the 15th of July.

You will there offer convoy; proceed to Matanzas, leave a letter bag with Messrs. Latting & Co., informing them you will sail on the 12th.

You will offer convoy from Matanzas; take in specie; return to Havana; take in specie from there, and return here for further orders, leaving Havana on the 15th of July.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commandant R. M. ROSE.

[Extract.]

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, July 13, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed to prepare the Weasel for a cruise, with all dispatch.

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commandant BEVERLY KENNON.

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, July 19, 1823.

SIR: When the Weasel shall be ready for sea, you will proceed to cruise for two weeks on the coast of Cuba, between Havana and Cape Antonio, at the expiration of which time you will return to this place.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commandant B. KENNON.

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, July 25, 1823.

SIR: I have directed Lieutenant Commandant Ritchie, who is cruising off Havana, to place himself and vessel under your command.

You can exercise your own discretion, whether to cruise to leeward or to windward of Havana.

It is my intention to send you home, and that you shall leave Havana for this place on the 15th of August. You can, therefore, leave a letter bag with Messrs. Castillo, Black & Co., calling for it on your return from your cruise, and taking on board specie, if any offers, for the United States, at 2½ per cent. freight.

From Havana, you will proceed here for further orders.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Com. B. KENNON.

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, August 14, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed to Washington city with the United States schooner Weasel, reporting her arrival to the honorable Secretary of the Navy, for such changes in the officers as may be necessary, and to fill up the crew—those being the objects of sending her home. When the necessary changes have been completed, she is to return to this place by the way of Crooked Island, or Caucus passages, running down the old Straits of Bahama, touching at Baracoa and Matanzas, showing yourself off Havana, and giving the whole coast a thorough examination.

It is extremely desirable that no unnecessary delay should take place in the United States, as the services of the Weasel will be wanted, and any delay will prevent my carrying into effect the arrangement of the periodical sailing of vessels from here.

I should presume that the vessel might leave the United States to return to her station, in one week from the time of her arrival; and, if you leave her, whoever may be your successor, I wish you to impress this on his mind, giving him a copy of this order.

In case you resign the command, there is no absolute necessity, should any difficulty occur, in sending a commander in her, as Mr. Randolph can bring her out, and the command can then be given to one of the old lieutenants on the station, some of whom are entitled to her.

With the assurance that it will ever afford me pleasure to be associated with you on duty, please to accept my best wishes for a speedy and pleasant passage, and a happy sight of your friends.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Com. BEVERLY KENNON.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, December 7, 1822.

SIR: Soon as the United States schooner Grampus shall be completely equipped for sea, proceed direct to the Havana, and resume your former cruise about the Island of Cuba, for the suppression of piracies, under your former instructions. John Warner, Esq., consul for the port of Havana, has permission to embark on board, to be landed at Havana.

I am, respectfully, &c.,

(Signed) SMITH THOMPSON.

Lt. Com. F. H. GREGORY, commanding U. S. Schooner Grampus, New York.

U. S. GALLIOT SEA GULL, Allenton, May 6, 1823.

SIR: So soon as you receive this, you will repair to this place, where the services of the Grampus are much wanting.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lt. Com. F. H. GREGORY.

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, June 13, 1823.

SIR: So soon as the Grampus shall be ready for sea, you will proceed to Matanzas, taking with you the barge Gnat, for the purpose of giving to our commerce there all the protection in your power against piracy, until you are relieved.

It will be well to visit occasionally the by places between Point Eycaco, Cayo Blanco, and Havana, if you can do so without leaving our merchant vessels unprotected.

You will be governed in the performance of your duties by my general instructions of the 26th of February.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lt. Com. F. H. GREGORY.

Lieutenant Commandant Gregory to Commodore Porter.

U. S. SCHOONER GRAMPUS, Thompson's Island, July 3, 1823.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that this vessel sailed from the Balize, on the 24th of April, with a convoy for Tabasco, where she arrived on the 1st of May. Sailed thence again on the 6th, with convoy, towards Vera Cruz; parted with the convoy on the 9th, and arrived at Campeachy on the 13th, where I received information of several piracies committed upon the merchant vessels of the United States; and that the coast of Yucatan, from Cape Catoche to Lagona, was then infested by several gangs of pirates, who had been guilty of every atrocity imaginable. Finding there were a very considerable number of merchant ships at the several ports upon that coast, unprotected, and others arriving almost daily, I continued thereabouts until the 25th of June, scouring the coast up and down; and, occasionally, when any information was had which offered the least chance of detecting those villains, the boats were employed, and sometimes were sent along the coast twenty and thirty leagues from the vessel. On the 22d of May, I chased a schooner ashore to windward of Sisal, which I have no doubt was a pirate, from his appearance and conduct; as it was in the night, and upon a part of the coast where I was not sufficiently acquainted, and blowing fresh upon the shore, I had not an opportunity of completing his destruction. On the 11th of June, I seized a suspicious vessel in the harbor of Campeachy, and resigned her to the authorities there, on that account. This last vessel had just come from New Malaga, or Vigia de Chiguila, a little to the windward of Cape Catoche, where the pirates have a very considerable establishment, and came down to Campeachy for the purpose of procuring stores for a vessel then preparing for a cruise. Two seamen, who had been held as prisoners at New Malaga, informed me that this gang were sometimes a hundred and upwards in number; that they held possession of a small fort, having two twenty-four pounders; and that an officer, named Molla, who had been placed there by the government, had joined them. This was corroborated by the authorities of Campeachy, who requested me to land and destroy the place. The pirates issue from their post in barges, small vessels, and in canoes, hover along the shores, enter the harbors, murder and destroy almost all that fall in their power. On the 2d of June, the American schooner Shibbolit, Captain Perry, of New York, being then ready for sea, was boarded by a canoe, having fourteen of those villains on board; the watch was instantly murdered, eight others of the crew were put in the forecastle, the hatch spiked down, a ton or more of logwood put over it, the head sails set, the wind off shore, and fire put to the vessel in the cabin. By the most extraordinary exertions, these men broke out in time to save their lives. I arrived while the vessel was burning down. The same canoe then proceeded to windward, and two days afterwards took the schooner Augustus and John, off Sisal, and burnt her, having turned the crew adrift in a small boat, with every probability of their perishing. The people of the country were much exasperated, and turned out to hunt them from their shores.

A party of dragoons having met them, a skirmish ensued, wherein the captain of dragoons, and several of his men, were killed, and the pirates, taking to their boats, escaped. One of the seamen I mentioned as having been amongst them, stated that he belonged to an English schooner from New Providence, called the Flyer; that the crew, with the exception of himself, were instantly butchered. He was detained by them about two months, during which time they had captured nine vessels, some of which were brought in, but the principal part destroyed; and, in some instances, he was certain that the whole crews were murdered. When he left the place, (about twenty days since,) they had a Guineaman, with two hundred slaves, and a large quantity of ivory; two small schooners, Americans. And an English cutter informed me that the pirates had a direct and uninterrupted intercourse with Havana, by means of small coasting vessels that ran regularly to the ports on the coast, and always touched at New Malaga. Frequently, some of them would go up to the Havana, and others of the gang come down.

That this infernal horde of villains have established themselves at New Malaga, I have no doubt; and, from the information given me by men of the first respectability at Campeachy, Sisal, and other places on the coast, I believe the pirates have been guilty of all the acts as herein stated.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

FRANCIS H. GREGORY, Lieut. Com. U. S. Navy.

Com. DAVID PORTER, commanding U. S. Naval Forces, West India Station.

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, July 4, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed to or near Key Vacas, in search of an armed schooner called the Centilla, and sailing under the Colombian flag, which has lately captured and sent to that place several Spanish vessels, which have been perfectly wrecked there, and the cargoes sold.

On meeting said vessel, you will require her commander to come with her to this place, and, should he refuse to do so, you will take possession of her, and bring her in. The captain of the Centilla claims for her the character of a national vessel. It is therefore desirable that no violence should be used, if it is possible to avoid it, as I can have no disposition or wish to offer any insult whatever to the officers or flag of any nation in amity with the United States. But as the conduct of the officers and crew of the Centilla has been such as to produce doubts as to her real character, and as they have disregarded and violated the neutral character and laws of the United States, and, by the wrecking on our coast, and selling of prizes before condemnation, committed piracy, the flag of Colombia must not protect them. The Centilla must be brought in here, and such of her crew and prizes as you may fall in with.

Force is only to be used in the last resort, and when every other means have failed. But, if necessary, it must be used until she submit.

Lieut. Rodgers, of the marines, can give you any information respecting her; and, if you learn from him that she has left the coast, you will return to this place.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER,

Commanding U. S. Naval Forces in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico.

Lieut. Com. F. H. GREGORY, commanding U. S. Schooner Grampus.

PORT RODGERS, Thompson's Island, September 16, 1823.

SIR: On your arrival here, you will set all the carpenters you can muster at work on the house building for the marine officers; you will take the brig, fitting for an hospital, and moor her carefully and securely at the upper part, and on the east side of the harbor.

You will use, for this purpose, one of the chain cables and anchors on shore, (she has a chain and anchor on board,) after which, you will please to finish her by laying her berth deck and laying a tier of cribs above and below on each side amidships, and finishing off with rough boards a snug cabin for the commander and surgeon, and closing her in all around on the outside with the same, leaving sufficient openings for ventilators, and for hoisting things in by fore and main yards; then all the new work must be whitewashed.

The hull of the brig is to be painted pretty much as it is now; this will take you about a fortnight or three weeks.

The barges are, however, in the first place, to be hauled up and carefully housed, and Mr. Platt is to take care of all the bargemen, until the arrival of the Hornet, when he will join her, with all of his officers and men.

After you have performed these duties, you will proceed to Campeachy, La Vera Cruz and Tampico, for the protection of our commerce, for six weeks or two months, and receive on board all moneys which may offer you, the destination of which is to the United States. You will proceed to Norfolk with it, where you will report to me at Washington.

You will touch at this place on your way home, as there is a possibility of my being here again by that time.

While you are here let your surgeons give all the aid in their power.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant, D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant F. H. GREGORY.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, Thompson's Island, January 28, 1824.

SIR: You will proceed down along the Colorados reef in search of the two barges, Gallinipper and Diabletta, as far as Cape Antonio, and should you meet them you will deliver to the officer in command of them the enclosed orders for their return to this place, after which you will return to Matanzas, for the purpose of giving protection to our commerce there, in conformity with my former instructions.

Very respectfully,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant MCKEEVER.

WASHINGTON, August 11, 1824.

SIR: As soon as the United States steam galliot Sea Gull shall have completed her repairs, and be in every respect ready for sea, you will proceed with her to New York, there to wait my further orders.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant ISAAC MCKEEVER, New York.

WASHINGTON, October 20, 1824.

SIR: You will proceed with the United States galliot Sea Gull, under your command, as speedily as possible to Matanzas, for the protection of our commerce there, and thence to Thompson's Island, where you will report yourself to the senior officer on the station for further instructions.

Very respectfully,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant MCKEEVER.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, Thompson's Island, January 5, 1825.

SIR: You will leave Lieutenant Bell in charge of the duties which have been assigned to you, in the neighborhood of Matanzas, with the two small schooners and the barges, and you will proceed with the Sea Gull to this place, touching at Havana.

You will please to bring with you all the letters and newspapers for myself and the officers here; and if Col. John Mifflin, of this place, and now at Havana, should wish to come over with you, I will thank you to give him a passage.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant I. MCKEEVER.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, January 13, 1824.

SIR: On receiving your provisions and water at Thompson's Island, after parting with the Spark, you will proceed to the coast of Yucatan, running down the coast from Cape Catoche to Campeachy; look in at Campeachy; then proceed to Alvarado, La Vera Cruz, and Tampico, at one of which places you will find the United States brig Spark, Lieutenant Commandant Newton, who will be there for the purpose of giving protection to our commerce, and the conveyance of specie to the United States.

If it is found that you can be advantageously employed in these duties, Lieut. Commandant Newton will be instructed to employ you there, and if not to send you back to Thompson's Island.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant JOHN P. ZANTZINGER, United States Schooner Weasel.

WASHINGTON, July 13, 1824.

SIR: I have received your communication of the 12th, which is satisfactory. There is an absolute necessity for your return to the West Indies immediately. Your orders will therefore be issued to-morrow.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant, D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant JOHN P. ZANTZINGER.

WASHINGTON, July 14, 1824.

SIR: You will proceed to the West Indies, touching at St. Bartholomew, St. Thomas, and running down the south side of Porto Rico and Cuba, touching, if necessary, at Jamaica, examining for pirates, and offering convoy and protection to the property and persons of our citizens, according to my general instructions.

You will then proceed around Cape Antonio to Thompson's Island, where you will fill up your provisions, and proceed thence to the port of Havana, and offer convoy to the Gulf of Mexico, running down the coast of Yucatan, touching at Campeachy, Alvarado, La Vera Cruz and Tampico, giving all the protection in your power to our commerce.

If, in the course of your cruise our citizens should wish specie carried from one port or place to another, you can take it on board under the restrictions formerly laid down to you, and on your arrival in the gulf, if there should be any considerable quantity to be taken to New Orleans, you can proceed there with it under like instructions. If it should be the opinion of the merchants at New Orleans, or the commanding naval officer, that the Weasel can be usefully employed between Tampico and that port, you can remain there six months, reporting to me from time to time; but if not, you will return with specie to the United States, touching at Havana and Thompson's Island for orders.

In the whole of your cruise, do not lose sight of the main object, the protection of the property and persons of our fellow citizens.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant JNO. P. ZANTZINGER.

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, August 10, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed with the U. S. brig Spark, under your command, off Havana, where you will offer convoy, and after the vessels shall be well off from the land, you will run down, examining the coast to Cape Antonio; thence around the south side of Cuba to the Isle of Pines and Trinidad, where you will offer protection and convoy.

Should there be information of pirates in that neighborhood that will, in your opinion, make your stay there necessary, you will continue to cruise about there for a reasonable length of time; you then will proceed to windward, examining the coast to Cape Cruz, where it is probable there are pirates, of which Lieut. Com. Kearney will give you particular information. These you will endeavor to capture and put to rout, giving the place a thorough examination.

From Cape Cruz proceed to St. Jago de Cuba, and there offer protection and convoy, remaining in the neighborhood of the place as long as in your judgment your presence may be required.

From thence continue your cruise to the east, around Cape Mayzi, thence down the north coast to Baracoa, there offering protection and convoy, and exercising your judgment as to the period of your stay about there.

Continue to examine the coast from thence down to Matanzas, through the Old Straits. At Matanzas you will, if necessary, fill up your water and offer convoy; then proceed off Havana, offer convoy, and return to this place.

Throughout your course you will endeavor by every means in your power to preserve the health of your crew, by avoiding infected places, by great attention to their comfort and cleanliness, and by preventing unnecessary exposure.

The object of the course being the suppression of piracy and the slave trade, reference, as your guide in the performance of these duties, is to be had to my general instructions, of the 26th February last.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Com. E. R. SHUBRICK, Brig Spark.

WASHINGTON, October 29, 1823.

SIR: When you shall have performed the duties required of you by my instructions of the ——, you will proceed to the coast of Yucatan, running down toward Campeachy, thence to La Vera Cruz and Tampico, giving such protection as may be in your power to the commerce and citizens of the United States, against unlawful interruptions.

Should merchants and others have specie to transport to the United States, you will take it on board, proceed to the port most convenient for their purpose, touching on your way at Thompson's Island, Havana, and Matanzas, for orders; and, in the event of not receiving any, you will, after landing your specie, return to Matanzas with all practicable dispatch, to receive my further instructions.

Very respectfully,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Com. E. R. SHUBRICK, Brig Spark.

WASHINGTON, August 11, 1824.

SIR: So soon as the U. S. schooner Ferret shall be in every respect ready for sea, you will proceed to the West Indies, running down through the islands, to ascertain whether our commerce requires protection; and if, in the course of your route, you should find protection necessary, you will afford it as far as your means will allow, governing yourself strictly in this respect by the general cruising instructions, and the orders of your predecessor.

You will run down the south side of Cuba, touching at St. Jago and Trinidad, examining the intermediate places, and then go round Cape Antonio, to Thompson's Island, where you will report to the senior officer there for further instructions.

At every place you touch, offer your vessel for convoy and protection.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Com. T. H. BELL.

WASHINGTON, August 12, 1824.

SIR: So soon as the United States schooner Ferret, under your command, shall be ready for sea, you will repair to Thompson's Island, and report yourself to the commanding officer there for further duty. On your way to the island, you will touch at Matanzas, and afford such protection to our commerce there as may be necessary. In the suppression of piracy and the slave trade, in the protection of the persons and property of citizens of the United States, and in your intercourse with foreign officers, you will be governed by my general cruising instructions and other orders, which you will receive from Acting Lieutenant Farragut.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Com. T. H. Bell.

U. S. Ship John Adams, Thompson's Island, January 5, 1825.

Sir: With the two schooners Ferret and Terrier, and the barges Musquito and Diabletta, you will take charge of the protection of the commerce of Matanzas, and the suppression of piracy in that neighborhood, until further orders. My general instructions of the 182 will be your guide in all cases where they can be applied.

You will call on Lating, Adams & Co. for such occasional and indispensable supplies as may be required for the vessel.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commandant Bell.

[Extract.]

Washington, December 21, 1822.

Sir: You will proceed to Norfolk with the eight schooners purchased for the suppression of piracy, and deliver them to the commandant of the Navy yard, to be manned and equipped.

As I have explained to you my ideas, generally, as to the manner of equipping these vessels, I shall refer Captain Warrington to you for information, time not allowing of my going into detail. They will each have on board three lieutenants, three midshipmen, a surgeon's mate, and twenty-four petty officers, seamen and marines, and boys; therefore, accommodation must be procured for that number.

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Directed to Lieutenant J. Newell, U. S. Navy.

Norfolk, February 8, 1823.

Sir: When the two schooners of which you have the charge shall be prepared, with the barges, &c., you will proceed with them to Thompson's Island, and there land their cargoes, after which you will place the barges in a condition for service, and await my arrival. The schooner hired by the month you will keep with you, the other you will discharge as soon as possible.

In landing the materials for building, you will consult, as far as practicable, our ultimate convenience. Midshipman Morehead, who will go out with you, has been some time on the island, and can give you much useful information relative thereto.

The circuitous route which I shall take with the squadron will prevent, in all probability, my arriving so soon as yourself. You will therefore have an opportunity of making yourself well acquainted with the harbor and navigation; and you will please to place buoys, of casks, to point out the deepest water, keeping a look-out for me in the offing, in order that you may give me your aid in taking the vessels to the best anchorage.

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Thos. Newell.

United States Ship Peacock, Allenton, April 10, 1823.

Sir: So soon as the schooner Mary, now called the Trap, shall be ready for sea with her provisions and stores, you will take on board a detachment of marines, and stretch over to the coast of Cuba, throwing yourself in the way of open boats from the shore, and making your way slowly down toward Cape Antonio, where I shall expect to find you after I have visited, with the steam vessel and barges, the coast to windward of Matanzas.

There is anchorage under the lee of the cape, and at Cape Conantas; and as I shall depend on you for my provisions and coal, it will be best for you to anchor at one of those places; but be careful to guard against a surprise, and also to conceal your force.

Accompanying this, you will receive a set of general instructions for your government.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commandant Thos. Newell, U. S. Schooner Trap.

Sea Gull, Port Rodgers, June 12, 1823.

Sir: You will proceed with the schooner Ferret under your command, to the south side of Cuba, to give protection to our commerce in that quarter; and when your provisions shall have been expended, you will return to this place.

It is my intention to send you to the United States, soon after your return; you can therefore take on board any sum of money which merchants may have to ship, and on such terms of freight as you can agree on.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commandant T. M. NEWELL.

Lieutenant Commandant Newell to Commodore Porter.

UNITED STATES SCHOONER FERRET, Thompson's Island, June 25, 1823.

SIR: Pursuant to your instructions, I left this place on the 14th inst., on a cruise to Trinidad, on the south side of Cuba, in company with the Beagle, Captain Newton. On the second day we parted company, and on the third day I made the Havana, (on my way to Matanzas;) from thence I commenced a diligent search in all the by ports and bays. On Tuesday sent my boat into Canised, and obtained information that some pirates were still lurking about the coast. During that night I kept close in with the land, and on Wednesday at 10 A. M. discovered an armed barge, with sixteen oars, and well manned, in a small bay, called Bacuna Yeauga. I immediately sent Lieutenant Dorning, with five men, the most my boat could carry, to examine all the boats, there being seven in number. He approached within fifty yards of the barge, when the crew showed their character by opening a fire on him with musketry and blunderbusses, which, fortunately, did no other damage than nearly to sink the boat, she having received a ball at the water edge. Five other ones were found in the boat, which, being nearly spent, had struck the water, and innocently jumped into her. My boat, at no time suitable for the transportation of men, and now rendered useless, induced me to take possession of a small coaster that was near, and manned her with fifteen men, and at that time intended to stand in, if possible, with the Ferret, in order to cover the men while they took possession of the barge, which then had the American colors, union down; but, on approaching, found that the channel would not admit of my entering. It then blowing very hard, and a heavy sea on, I deemed it proper to recall the coaster, which had like to have gotten ashore: for, had that catastrophe occurred, I question much whether the pirates would have had the gratification of butchering them, as they certainly would have been drowned. The sea was then breaking with great violence over the reef that covered the bay. I was then compelled to resort to making tacks, close in with the reef, and giving them long tom, with round and grape, in hopes to destroy the boats—as to killing any of them it was impossible: for, on the approach of the Ferret, they would completely secure themselves behind the rocks and trees, which hung all around the harbor; but this I was frustrated in, by the enormous roughness of the sea; and, the wind being on shore, prevented me from taking any position from which I could annoy them much. Finding it impossible to do anything with the means then in my power, I stood out to sea, in hopes to fall in with some vessel from which I could get a suitable boat, (but, I am sorry to say, that it was not until next morning that my wishes were obtained,) and, if that could not be done, to push to Matanzas, to concert a plan with the governor, by which the pirates, as well as their boats, may be taken. I, however, obtained a boat from an English vessel, and immediately bore up for the same place, which was then but a short distance off. I had not run but a short time, when I discovered a Spanish brig of war lying to, off the bay, which proved to be the Matae. On the report being sent to the Governor of Matanzas, that one of the United States schooners was engaged with the pirates, he dispatched this brig, and at the same time took with him a land force, and had cruised there a few minutes before me, and had taken possession of a small schooner boat the pirates had abandoned, and which lay on the beach. I sent in my boat after he had left, and ordered a search, when two of the boats I had seen the day I attacked them, were found, well sunk, up a lagoon, which, upon further examination, extended several miles into the island, and have no doubt but that the large barge is now at the head of it; but, not being prepared with boats, I did not think it proper to send my boats out from the Ferret. The two boats I have brought over, and shall await your orders relative thereto.

On my arrival at Matanzas, I found my mainmast very dangerously sprung, which has made it necessary for me to return here, but not until I had given convoy to eight of our merchantmen from Matanzas and Havana.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, you obedient servant,

THOMAS M. NEWELL.

Com. DAVID PORTER, Commander of the United States Naval Forces, West India Station.

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, July 13, 1823.

SIR: After landing the persons, you will run down the coast to Artigasa to search for some cannon and ball left there by a pirate, which you will take on board if you find them.

You will then look in at Cayo Blanco, on the eastern part of the Colorados, and return to this place.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant THOMAS M. NEWELL.

Lieutenant Commandant Newell to Commodore Porter.

U. S. SCHOONER FERRET, Port Rodgers, July 23, 1823.

SIR: I have the honor to report to you that, after delivering the pirates at Havana, I cruised down the coast of Cuba to the windward, as far as Cayo Blanco, and examined every creek and harbor. After searching and diving for sometime at Artigos, (a small hidden river,) I found the guns you alluded to in your instructions; also, a new gun carriage, calculated for a twenty-four pounder, was taken from the mangroves, where the pirates had carefully hidden it. My vessel being so much lumbered up, I could not bring it; I therefore cut it up, and saved the irons; the guns taken are five in number—one long six-pounder, one short six-pounder, one nine-pounder carronade, and two long threes; the latter well mounted, and appear to have been very recently placed there.

I then returned to Havana, and, on Sunday last, gave convoy to six American, and one Danish ship.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS M. NEWELL.

Com. D. PORTER, commanding U. S. Naval Forces in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico.

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, July 24, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed with the schooner Ferret, under your command, to Havana, leave your letter bag at the counting house of Messrs. Castillo, Black & Co.; offer convoy; continue cruising in the neighborhood, for the protection of our commerce; and should merchants or others wish to avail themselves of this opportunity to send specie to the United States, you can take it on board at the usual freight, leaving Havana on the 1st of August and returning to this place for further orders.

Very respectfully your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant THOMAS M. NEWELL.

[Extract.]

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, August 1, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed to Washington with the United States schooner Ferret, reporting her arrival to the Hon. Secretary of the Navy, for such changes in the officers as may be necessary, and to fill up her crew, these being the objects of sending her home. When the necessary changes have been completed, she is to return to this place by the way of Crooked Island, or Caicos passages, running down the old Straits of Bahama, touching at Baracoa and Matanzas, showing yourself off Havana, and giving the whole coast a thorough examination.

It is extremely desirable that no unnecessary delay should take place in the United States, as the services of the Ferret will be wanted, and any unnecessary delay will prevent my carrying into effect the arrangements of the periodical sailing of vessels from here.

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Directed to Lieut. Commandant THOMAS M. NEWELL.

[Extract.]

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, July 19, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed to Havana to give protection to our commerce; and you will communicate with Messrs. Castillo & Black every day.

Should they have any communications for me, you will lose no time in conveying them to this place.

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Directed to Lieut. Commandant JNO. T. RITCHIE.

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, July 25, 1823.

SIR: You will place yourself and vessel under the command of Lieut. Com. Kennon.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant JNO. RITCHIE, Schooner Fox.

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, August 8, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed to Havana with the U. S. schooner FOX, and place yourself under the command of Captain Sidney Smith.

Should Captain Smith have left Havana, you will proceed with all possible dispatch to a place called New Malaga, near Cape Catoche, on the coast of Yucatan, where it is said there is a piratical establishment; and in the event of your not finding Captain Smith there, you will proceed to obtain all the information in your power with regard to said establishment, and return to this place with all possible dispatch.

You will endeavor to ascertain whether a British force has gone against it, how far it has extended its operations, and whether successful or otherwise.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant J. T. RITCHIE.

Lieutenant Commandant Ritchie to Commodore Porter.

U. S. Schooner Fox, August 29, 1823.

Sir: In compliance with your instructions, of the 8th ultimo, I proceeded to the coast of Yucatan, to ascertain the situation of a piratical establishment, said to be there. On the 14th, I arrived off the port of New Madrid, (New Malaga) and immediately sent a boat to obtain all the information possible, relative to the situation and character of the fortification.

It gives me great pleasure to inform you that the establishment alluded to is a fortification for the protection of the town of New Malaga, recently established there for commercial purposes, and that no pirates have been heard of on that coast for some time.

The enclosed letter from the commandant at that place, in answer to a letter addressed to him, by me, will, no doubt fully explain their character; also, a letter from the commander of H. B. M. brig Scout, on the subject of the attack on the fort, which, no doubt, gave rise to the report of its being a piratical establishment, and the answer thereto upon that subject.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN T. RITCHIE.

Com. D. Porter, commanding West India Station.

Port Rodgers, Thompson's Island, September 16, 1823.

Sir: You will proceed to Washington without delay, touching at Norfolk to land your specie. On your arrival you will report yourself to the Secretary of the Navy and Navy Commissioners for repairs.

You will inform them that I am on my way home in the Sea Gull.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant Jno. T. Ritchie.

United States Ship John Adams, Thompson's Island, April 16, 1824.

Sir: You will proceed with the Fox, accompanied by the Beagle, Lieutenant Commandant Cross, to the Colorado reef, and endeavor there to join and co-operate with the Sea Gull and barges under the command of Captain Wilkinson, in pursuit of pirates.

Should you not join Captain Wilkinson before reaching Cape Antonio, you will wait his arrival there, near which place you will find the Grayhound. You will receive from him your further orders.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant John T. Ritchie.

U. S. Ship John Adams, Thompson's Island, April 12, 1824.

Sir: You will proceed to Havana, and should any of our merchants have specie for New Orleans, you will take it on board on the usual freight, and proceed to that place.

From thence you will proceed to Tampico, and continue to ply between that place and New Orleans, giving such protection to our commerce in that quarter as may be in your power.

Endeavor to make your arrival and departure as regular as possible, in order that persons requiring your protection may be enabled to make their arrangements accordingly.

You will make all your requisitions, and receive all your supplies of provisions in New Orleans, and report yourself at every arrival and departure to the commanding officer there, and you will seek every opportunity of communicating with me.

You will return to this place by the first of October, unless otherwise instructed, and you may touch at Havana before coming here, for the purpose of landing specie.

I have read to you the instructions of the honorable Secretary of the Navy, relative to the transportation of treasures; I have no apprehensions that you will go beyond the authority given—it is therefore needless to make any further communication to you on the subject. I will merely remark, however, that none of the vessels of war under my command must on any account whatever, and under any inducement, be used for the purposes of commercial adventure.

You can carry the treasure of our citizens from one port or place to another, and you can take it to the United States, but nothing in the shape of public advertisements must appear; and in all your intercourse with the authorities of the places you may visit, make frank acknowledgments of the motives which brought you there. Let all your transactions in this respect be open, and not liable to misapprehension. Nothing, whatever, in the shape of clandestine shipments must be countenanced.

For the information of the government, you will, on joining me, report to me the amount of treasures which you have on board your vessel, where taken from, where destined, and the circumstances, terms, and conditions on which you have taken them.

During your stay in the gulf, as well as on your passage out and home, you will seek every occasion to give protection to the persons and property of the citizens of the United States.

Wishing you a pleasant and a profitable cruise, I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

To Lieutenant Commandant John T. Ritchie.

WASHINGTON, October 14, 1824.

SIR: I have received your several communications respecting the schooner Fox, under your command. She is to be got in readiness for sea with the least possible delay; and when ready, you will report to me.

Very respectfully,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commandant J. RITCHIE.

WASHINGTON, October 27, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed to Matanzas, in the Island of Cuba, with the schooner Beagle, and there join the Wild Cat, which you will find there. With these two vessels, you will give such protection as may be in your power, against pirates, to the commerce of the United States, and to the vessels of all nations requiring it.

You will receive your supplies of all kinds from Thompson's Island. You are to be governed in your operations by my general instructions of the 26th of February.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commandant Jos. CROSS.

UNITED STATES SCHOONER WEASEL, Alvarado, December 5, 1824.

SIR: I sailed from Thompson's Island on the 17th of September, for Havana, off which port I fell in with, and convoyed in, the American brig Herald, of Boston. After watering, sailed from Campeachy, giving convoy to three American schooners—(the Dact, Commerce, and Superior,) to the Bank; arrived there 27th September, and sailed on the 29th for Alvarado. On the 6th of October, a little to the east of Alvarado, spoke the United States schooner Shark, Captain Gallagher; received instructions to stand for and anchor at Sacrificios, for the purpose of taking on board Mr. Taylor, American consul, (then on board the Shark,) and returning with him to Alvarado. In riding out a norther at Sacrificios, I parted my hemp cable, and was unable to find the anchor. I have been under the necessity of purchasing a cable and anchor in this port. Sailed from Vera Cruz on the 9th, and arrived here on the 10th. On my arrival, received a letter from the American consul, giving an account of the capture of the American brig Cato, by the pirates, and the schooner Leader wanting protection at Tabasco; a copy of which letter is enclosed, and marked A. I was compelled to remain a few days in port, to repair my sails, and procure an anchor and cable; which being done, I sailed on the 19th for Tabasco. In consequence of a strong southwesterly current, we drifted in near Chittepeque river, where I dispatched a boat with an officer for a pilot; the boat returned without the officer, the commandant having detained him. Situated thus, I thought it most advisable to stand for the river; which I did, and anchored directly opposite the fort, and in good shot distance. I was determined to knock down his fort, if he did not give up the officer immediately, and take him by force. Immediately on the demand being made, he delivered him up, making many apologies for having detained him. Here I was detained near two weeks, by a continual succession of northers, which rendered it impossible to cross the bar. On the 28th, I received a letter from Captain Dulany, dated Villa Hermosa, requesting to see me; a copy of which I have enclosed, and marked B. The next day I proceeded there in the cutter, for the purpose of seeing the two captains; reached there in two days; on the third, returned to the vessel, bringing with me Captain Dulany, of the Cato. On my return, I had the pleasure of finding the water on the bar quite smooth; and sailed for Tabasco, where I arrived on 6th November. After a few days' delay I proceeded to Chiapa river, distant about thirty-four miles from the mouth of the river. I here found it imprudent to proceed farther up the river, in consequence of sickness, which was brought on by excessive fatigue, in warping up against a four knot current I dispatched Acting Lieutenant Taylor, with Captain Dulany, in the cutter, to Villa Hermosa, and sent a letter to the governor, requesting him to facilitate the brig and schooner's passage down the river. On their arrival I set sail and convoyed them fifty miles clear of the coast, and then stood for this place, where I arrived on the 29th. The Weasel has been actively and usefully employed on this station, particularly in this port. On my first arrival I found nearly all the crews of the American vessels down with sickness, and my men were compelled to assist them in various ways—in taking care of their vessels, &c. Since being in the gulf I have had much sickness on board, which was brought on by the severe duty performed by my men. Jacob Rise, O. S., died in this port on the 28th October, of the fever. Now, with pleasure I inform you, my officers and crew are in good health, and shall sail from this port for Tampico as soon as the present norther is over, and the bar smooth enough to cross with safety. I have been compelled to draw two or three bills on government, in supplying my vessel with provisions, &c. In consequence of Acting Lieutenant Carr leaving the vessel at Philadelphia, I appointed Sailing Master E. C. Taylor lieutenant in his place; which appointment, I presume, will meet your approbation—since which time he has been performing both duties.

I have the honor to be, with much respect, your obedient servant,
CHAS. BOARMAN, Lieut. Commandant U. S. Schooner Weasel.

U. S. SCHOONER WEASEL, Havana, January 21, 1825.

SIR: I have the honor to report the arrival at this port of the U. S. schooner Weasel, thirteen days from Tampico. The particulars of my movements up to my leaving Alvarado I presume you have received. Sailed from that port for Tampico on the 7th December, and arrived there on the 12th. I continued at that anchorage till the twelfth instant, giving all necessary assistance to our merchantmen, which was great. Thomas Gray, seaman, was drowned by a fall from the main boom in assisting one of them. John S. Holey, O. S., deserted. The Weasel has not been successful in capturing pirates, but she has been both usefully and actively employed in giving protection to our commerce. Further particulars I will give you during the day.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

CHAS. BOARMAN, Lieut. Commandant U. S. Schooner Weasel.

SEA GULL, Havana, January 24, 1825.

SIR: You will proceed to a convenient port of the United States, there land the money on board your vessel, and report yourself to the Hon. Secretary of the Navy, and the state and condition of your vessel to the Board of Navy Commissioners.

Very respectfully,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant BOARMAN.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, Thompson's Island, April 25, 1824.

SIR: When the Sea Gull and Gillinipper are ready for sea, you will proceed with them to Matanzas, and there await my further orders, giving all protection in your power to our commerce in that quarter.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant R. VORHEES.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, April 24, 1824.

SIR: With the United States schooner Jackal under your command, accompanied by the Wild Cat, Lieutenant Legare, you will proceed to the Island of Mugeres or Woman's Island, on the coast of Yucatan, near Cape Catoche, in search of and for the destruction of a piratical establishment said to exist there. From thence you will continue to cruise along that coast towards Sical, giving it a thorough examination.

From Sical you will send the Wild Cat to me with a report of your proceedings, and shape your course toward Campeachy, and thence to Alvarado, Sacrificios, and Tampico, looking in at La Vera Cruz, at one of which places you will meet this ship; and at the time, or soon after your arrival, you will receive by her instructions as to your further proceedings.

You will ask of Lieutenant Commandant Oellers my general instructions, which will explain to you the duties you have to perform as regards the suppression of piracy and the slave trade.

During your stay in the gulf, and on your passage there, you will seek every occasion to give protection to the persons and property of our citizens.

Wishing you a pleasant and successful cruise, I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant JOHN H. LEE.

Copy of a letter from Lieutenant Commandant John H. Lee to Commodore David Porter, commanding United States naval forces on the West India station, Gulf of Mexico, and coast of Africa, dated—

U. S. SCHOONER JACKAL, Sical, May 12, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to report to you that, for the purpose of executing your orders to me on the 25th of April, the Jackal and Wild Cat sailed on the 26th of that month from Thompson's Island. On the following day we made the coast of Cuba, (Bahia Honda,) and passing Cape Antonio in the night, we were unable to look in there, although I felt a great desire to do so. On the 29th arrived off Cape Catoche, and on the same afternoon anchored between the Island of Contoy and the main land. This island is small and thinly wooded, so that it required but a few hours to examine every part of it. We could discover no traces of any persons living there, or even of any persons having been there, except two thatched huts in a very decayed state.

Early on the morning of the 30th we left that island, and approaching as near the shore as the safety of the vessels would permit, we proceeded to the Island of Mugeres, and in the night anchored between its southwest end and the main land. On the following morning, having found the watering place, the vessels were removed to it, and, at the same time, detachments of men were sent on shore for the purpose of commencing an examination.

This island is larger, more thickly wooded, and much more difficult of access than Contoy; and we were, consequently, compelled to proceed at a comparatively slow rate. But, sir, I can safely say that, at the expiration of two days, almost every foot of Mugeres had been traversed.

We found here six Indians from the vicinity of Sical. They stated that they made annual visits to this island for the purpose of making salt, large quantities of which were piled up on the borders of the salt ponds in the interior. While at Mugeres we were visited by several parties of Indians from the main and the Island of Cankum.

I could glean nothing satisfactory from these men respecting piracy. The stories they told were so very contradictory, and seemingly without foundation, that it was impossible to reconcile them with each other, or with truth; but from all I could hear, and from my own observations, Mugeres has not, for the last two years, been the resort of pirates.

A severe gale detained us at anchor three days longer than was necessary, and this circumstance afforded an opportunity of visiting the main land, which was done by Lieutenant Commandant Legare and Lieutenant Piercy, though without discovering anything more than a few uninhabited fishing huts. On the 7th of this month, we sailed from Mugeres, and passing again by Contoy, anchored near Cape Catoche, and here, sir, our researches were as little to our satisfaction as they had been hitherto. Nothing was to be seen but an old dilapidated church and a fishing hut. From thence we continued our course towards New Malaga, examining the coast as we went along, and arrived there on the afternoon of the 8th. Some of the Indians had informed me that a piratical vessel was fitting out at that place; but, sir, no such vessel was there on our arrival, and the commandant, who is apparently a respectable man, assured me that the Fox was the last vessel he had seen.

On the 9th we left New Malaga, and coasted it along within two miles of the shore, looking into all the inlets, and communicating with almost every settlement between Malaga and Sical, until our arrival at the latter place, late on the 11th. From the time we commenced our examination of the coast, we have never sailed during the night, except once in chase of a schooner, which proved to be a privateer fitted out at Sical, and then, sir, I returned, with the Jackal, to the place I discovered her, and waited until the following morning.

At this port the commandant has been barely civil to us, and the inhabitants generally appear to view us more in the light of spies than friends.

You will perceive from this report, sir, the manner in which we have performed our duty, and I sincerely hope it will meet with your approbation. To the prompt and active exertions of Lieutenant Legare I feel much indebted; and I assure you it would have afforded me great pleasure to have been associated with him for a longer time.

From this place I shall proceed with all possible dispatch, to execute your further orders.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

JOHN H. LEE.

Commodore D. PORTER, commanding United States Naval Forces on the West India Station, Gulf of Mexico, and Coast of Africa.

MATANZAS, June 5, 1824.

SIR: After touching at Thompson's Island, you will proceed to the coast of East Florida, and give it a thorough examination, to discover an establishment there, said to be of a piratical or irregular character, somewhere about Charlotte Harbor, Chatham's Bay, or between that and Tampa Bay.

The inhabitants are said to be Spaniards and Indians; hoist the Spanish flag and have two guns mounted. You will have intercourse with them, ascertain their true character, force, and condition, and on your return make me a detailed report. Should you find the aid of a land force necessary, you can no doubt obtain it from the military commanding officer of the post at Tampa Bay.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commandant JAMES M. MCINTOSH.

ALLENTON, Thompson Island, July 8, 1824.

SIR: I had the pleasure of addressing you on the 5th inst. by the Diabletta, enclosing a copy of a letter from Captain P. C. Greene, and a sick report, which I trust you will receive at an early period, as the weather has been uncommonly fine since she sailed. The departure of the Martha this evening with a load of flour affords me another opportunity to communicate to you our situation. The expedition in the barge will necessarily impede much our progress in the buildings and other improvements, for in giving her a complement I have left the island almost destitute. The new store which I find by a letter of Lieutenant Oellers, dated 29th ult., reported to be nearly finished, I regret to say is little more than half done; it is only in part covered, floor not laid, no partitions up, or doors or windows made, nor have I any person at present to continue on with it. The only two carpenters at present on the island I have employed putting a small addition to the house formerly occupied by Captain Wilkinson, to render it barely comfortable for my family. But I am in hopes soon to complete the store on the return of the Diabletta. I would take the liberty of suggesting the propriety of a house carpenter being employed, rated as master carpenter, and sent out immediately; the good advantages which would arise from it I have perceptibly seen displayed with the citizens working for Mr. Simonton. Since his return from Baltimore with a decent young man in that capacity, almost double the work has been performed by his carpenters, and I find that I cannot, with all the attention I can possibly bestow, have as much done by men employed in the public service. I cannot lay out their work, or do I really know, to be candid, what is a day's work for a house carpenter, and having no person here who feels any ambition in forwarding that branch, I am liable constantly to impositions.

I have the honor to enclose you a duplicate copy of Captain Green's letter, and Doctor Bassit's sick report of to-day, by which you will find one of the cases reported by him on the 5th as bilious remittent fever, marked to-day as a case of yellow fever; and I regret to inform you that Richard Purcels, a private marine, died yesterday at the hospital of what the doctor calls a low type of bilious fever. It is with much pain, sir, that I am compelled to inform you that I witness, daily, symptoms among the men a little alarming; almost every day since my arrival and command here one or more have been taken with severe vomiting, pains in the head and bones, and the disease appears to fluctuate, one day at work and the next a relapse; and it is high time that Dr. Bassit was assisted in his duties. His riding twice a day frequently from the hospital to Allenton and his exposure to sun is well calculated to bring on disease; and if he is indisposed we are deprived entirely of medical assistance.

I have endeavored to gain, for the purpose of communicating to you, all the information respecting the cruise of Domingo on the coast of Yucatan. It appears that he was connected, in his piratical depredation, with Diabletta, and that, in the division of prize goods captured, a dispute arose; in consequence of too large a portion being demanded by the two leaders, the men seized a blunderbuss and literally blew Diabletta to pieces. Domingo escaped with a severe sabre cut on his arm, by jumping overboard and swimming to shore. Joseph Morales saw him since his return from Yucatan, and corraborated these circumstances.

I have, sir, respectfully to request that I may be informed if there is a probability of my being permanently stationed here. The command of the yard I presume I shall not retain longer than the sickly season; after that time many superior to me will be making applications; and although I have every confidence in your disposition to do me justice, still I am aware that the calls of superiors must be attended to. But as I am now making preparations for my family, it would be a great source of satisfaction to me to know if I could hold the situation of executive officer of the yard, if superseded in the command.

The plants are doing well; the late showers of rain which we have had have much revived them. I have not yet received any cocoa-nut plants, but expect them in the Terrier. I have allowed fifty of the nuts to be planted by Col. Mifflin and Captain Greene within the enclosure.

I have the honor to be, sir, most respectfully,

JAS. M. McINTOSH, Lt. Com.

Com. DAVID PORTER, Commander-in-Chief of the U. S. Naval Forces in the West Indies, Gulf of Mexico, Coast of Africa, &c.

Extract of a letter rom Lieutenant Commandant James M. McIntosh to Commodore D. Porter, communicated to the Secretary of the Navy, dated—

ALLENTON, Thompson's Island, July 12, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the Terrier, with the barge Diabletta in company, returned here yesterday. Lieut. Paine reports the brig robbed off Escondio to have been the Acasta of Portland. They robbed her of two thousand dollars in cargo, her sails and anchors, beat the commander and crew severely, and then suffered her to proceed to Havana.

Could I, sir, have received the information one day earlier, the Diabletta would have completely succeeded in recapturing the property, and probably have detected the pirates in the very act. The property stolen has been carried to Havana, at which place Mr. Paine saw and conversed with the master of the Acasta. The appearance of the barge at so early a period after the transaction, together with the very strict search, I trust will have a good effect.

Extract of a letter from Lieutenant Commandant McIntosh to Commodore David Porter, communicated to the Secretary of the Navy, dated—

ALLENTON, Thompson's Island, August 8, 1824.

The Terrier, Lieut. Paine, returned yesterday morning with the medical stores which I had the honor to inform you were necessary for the station, on the 2d inst. She has been longer executing this service than could have been contemplated, in consequence of continued calms since she sailed from here, and considerable drift to the eastward. She sails again to-day for Matanzas, with orders to give convoy to any of our vessels requiring it, and then to proceed and examine minutely the key in the vicinity of Point Yeacos and the Bay of Suagasa, from thence to run down the north coast of Cuba to Bahia Honda, at which place piratical depredations are said to be almost daily committed.

WASHINGTON, August 12, 1824.

SIR: I have received your various communications by the different vessels that have arrived from the island, all of which are satisfactory to me.

As regards your continuing on the island, you may rest assured that there is no disposition on my part to make any change whatever in your situation, and it is not my opinion that any change will be made by the Department.

You may therefore, I think, consider yourself permanently fixed.

It is likely that I shall be out in a month or two after you receive this, and it is my intention to reside for a time on the island, to commence some extensive improvements, affecting its salubrity, that I have in contemplation; I shall therefore want my house finished that I may be comfortable.

I sent several mechanics out in the Wild Cat, expressly for the purpose of being employed on the island; you must endeavor to work them to the best advantage. I laid down a plan for the porches round my house, but on consideration I wished them changed to the one enclosed, letting the rafters commence and rest on the rafters of the main building, about one-half the distance up from the eaves, instead of commencing at the eaves as in the old plan. This arrangement will allow of the porch being much wider than formerly intended; it would be very desirable to have it thirteen feet. The eaves of the porch need not be lower than the eaves of the main building, which will make the whole sightly, light, and airy. I have sent out medical aid in the Decoy; I hope it may arrive in season. I would advise that the men be as little exposed as possible to the weather—the more they are kept under shelter the better.

I am in hopes you will be able to get through this season without much sickness. Endeavor to keep every one as comfortable as you can, and let me hear from you by every favorable opportunity, that I may be well informed of the state of the island. Inform Mr. Mifflin and Mr. Symington that I have received their communications, but the appointment of Mr. Pinkney renders it unnecessary to act on them.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Com. JAS. McINTOSH.

WASHINGTON, August 12, 1824.

SIR: I have received your communication of the 18th ultimo, respecting the Spanish schooner Trinadada, and approve of the course you have pursued with regard to that vessel.

Mr. Easton's disinterested conduct in giving up the vessel, without salvage, will no doubt have the happiest effect in preserving the good understanding which happily exists between us and the authorities of Cuba, and will have a tendency to remove the prejudices which exist against us among the mass of the community. I wish you to return to him my thanks.

Respectfully,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant JAMES M. McINTOSH.

WASHINGTON, August 19, 1824.

SIR: I enclose a copy of a letter from Colonel George M. Brook to the Secretary of War.

Instructions formerly given, accompanied by a copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, of the 19th March last, will be your guide as to the course to be taken in regard to the timber lands of the United States, on the coast of Florida.

I wish a detailed report from the officer you send, as to his proceedings, and the value, condition, quantity, and situation of the timber mentioned by Colonel Brook.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Com. JAMES M. McINTOSH, Commanding Officer, Thompson's Island.

Extract of a letter from Lieutenant Commandant James M. McIntosh to Commodore David Porter, communicated to the Secretary of the Navy, dated—

ALLENTON, Thompson's Island, August 25, 1824.

The United States schooner Wild Cat, Lieutenant Commandant Legare, arrived here on the 20th instant from Matanzas. By Lieutenant Legare I received your instructions of the 14th, 15th, and 16th ult., and shall avail myself of her sailing this evening, to comply with the order of the 16th.

The Wild Cat, from the representation of her commander, was permitted to heave out and overhaul; every exertion, however, has been made to get her ready for sea; she is now in good order, and will, with the Terrier, I hope, be enabled to protect our commerce in the vicinity of Havana and Matanzas.

Lieutenant Legare spoke the Terrier the night previous to his going into Matanzas, to windward, where I had ordered her for the purpose of examining Point Yeacas and Suaguassa Bay; and it is with pleasure I inform you, that he stated the Terrier to have been successful in the capture of a pirate, a launch with from eight to ten men. I expect the Terrier, Lieutenant Paine, every hour; on her arrival I will embrace the first opportunity of giving you the particulars of this pleasing information.

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, July 3, 1823.

SIR: On Captain Skinner leaving the Wild Cat, you will take charge of her, and so soon as the number of her officers and crew are completed, and her stores and supplies of every kind on board, you will return to this place, passing through the Canous or Crooked Island passage, running down the old Strait of Bahama, touching at Baracoa and Matanzas, showing yourself off Havana, and giving the whole coast a thorough examination.

If, however, the honorable Secretary of the Navy should appoint another commander to the Wild Cat, you will transfer to him these orders for his government.

It is extremely desirable that there should be as little delay as possible in the United States, and you will use every effort to return as soon as possible.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. F. G. WOLBERT.

WASHINGTON, August 11, 1824.

SIR: As soon as the U. S. schooner Beagle shall have completed her repairs, and be in every respect ready for service, you will proceed to St. Thomas, for the protection of our commerce in that quarter, governing yourself in the duties to be performed by the general cruising instructions, and the orders issued to your predecessor. You will continue on that station, furnishing convoy and protection to our merchant vessels through the passages, until my arrival there, or until further orders.

Should your vessel require any supplies of provisions, stores, &c., you can obtain them by application to Mr. Furnace, a merchant of that place, who has offered to furnish them.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commandant C. T. PLATT.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, Thompson's Island, January 28, 1825.

SIR: In consequence of the affair at Foxardo, I have been directed by the Hon. Secretary of the Navy to repair to Washington, in order that the merits of the case may be perfectly understood, and it is considered important that all witnesses in the case, and particularly yourself, should be present. It is also desirable that all written testimony that can be had, should be produced.

You will therefore call on Mr. Stephen Cabot, and Messrs. Bergest and Whlhorn, and get their depositions as to the particulars of the robberies on their stores, explaining to them the object, and the great importance it is to me, that proofs should be had that the robberies, in former cases, had been traced to Foxardo and its neighborhood. You will also call on Messrs. Ellis, Gibson & Co., John Kettle, Esq., Robert Alexander, Esq., Saubot, Taubert & Co., and all others whose stores have been robbed, and ask them for their depositions respecting the particulars of the robberies; the tracing of them to Foxardo; the detection of the perpetrators, and particularly in the case of Messrs. Ellis, Gibson & Co.; also ask these gentlemen, as well as Messrs. Bergest and Whlhorn, for the original attested copies of all correspondence they may have had on the subject of these with Mr. James Campos, or any other person residing at Foxardo, or any other place to which these robbers had been traced.

You will please to ask Messrs. Cabot, Bailey & Co. to assist you in collecting all the testimony, in the fullest manner, as I conceive it to be of the highest importance to the mercantile interest of the United States that the landing on the Spanish coast for the suppression of piracy, and the holding the local authorities responsible, should be justified.

When you have collected all the information and testimony you can obtain on the subject, you will repair with the U. S. schooner Beagle to Washington, where you will report yourself to me.

With great respect,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant PLATT.

WASHINGTON, October 20, 1824.

SIR: You will proceed, accompanied by Midshipman L. M. Goldsborough and J. Boarman, in the United States schooner FOX, now at this place, to Pensacola and Tampa Bay, for the purpose of surveying those places, and reporting on the same at as early a day as possible.

Your examination and report will be directed to the following point, to wit, the depth of water on the bar.

Very respectfully, D. PORTER.

Lieutenant J. W. SHERBURNE.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, Thompson's Island, January 15, 1825.

SIR: You will proceed to the port of Matanzas with the barge Gallinipper, and there await my arrival.

Very respectfully,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Acting Lieutenant BENJAMIM S. GRIMKE.

U. S. STEAM GALLIOT SEA GULL, Havana, June 20, 1825.

SIR: You will proceed with the barges to leeward, inside the Colorados, as far as Cape Antonio, in pursuit of pirates, searching, in your way, every place likely to give them shelter.

Between Porto Coranas and Bahia Honda is a small river called Artigosa, where they formerly took shelter, and where, if there are any on the coast, they may probably be found. Cayo Blanco and Rio Puercos are also suspicious places, and require to be well examined.

You will use every means in your power to preserve a good understanding with the authorities of the places you may visit, and you will protect the honest and peaceable inhabitants; but whenever you find fishermen without their families, you will give them a rigid examination, and if you find them without license and with arms, you will destroy their establishments, and, if there is good and sufficient reasons to believe that they have been engaged in acts of piracy, you will bring them off with you or deliver to a Spanish civil or military officer. You will endeavor to get back to the John Adams at Thompson's Island, in fifteen or twenty days.

Very respectfully,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant GRIMKE.

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, July 19, 1823.

SIR: On your arrival at Washington, you will receive the schooner Terrier, from Lieutenant Commandant Rose, and proceed to get her in readiness to return to this place without delay.

The Terrier will require a new suit of sails, caulking; her crew completed and her stores replenished.

If the Secretary of the Navy should not appoint a commander, you will, as soon as ready, return here through the Crooked Island or Caucus passage, and down the south side of Cuba, touching at St. Jago and Trinidada, looking in at Cape Antonio, and showing yourself off Havana.

Should a commander be appointed, you will hand him these instructions for his government; you will apply to the Board of Navy Commissioners for orders respecting the repairs.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Acting Lieutenant WM. MCKEAN.

Lieut. Commandant Rose will please to land his marines, and make me a return of the officers, seamen, ordinary seamen and boys, on board his vessel.

Respectfully,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

SEA GULL, July 19, 1823.

P. S.—You will please cause all the sweeps and spare oars of the Terrier to be delivered to the store keeper at Allenton.

(Signed) D. P.

Copy of a letter from Acting Lieutenant Alexander B. Pinkham to Commodore David Porter, communicated to the Secretary of the Navy, dated—

U. S. SCHOONER BEAGLE, Quarantine Ground, New York, August 4, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to acquaint you of the arrival of the Beagle at this place, in eleven days, from Thompson's Island, and have also the painful duty of announcing to you the death of the late commander of this vessel, Lieut. N. L. Montgomery, who died on the 30th ultimo, in latitude 35 degrees, 23 minutes north, longitude 74 degrees, 30 minutes, in consequence of which I considered it my duty to acquaint you with the events of our cruise, in continuation of a report commenced by Lieut. Montgomery, found among his papers, and hereto attached.

The convoy from St. Jago de Cuba, consisted of the brigs Susan, of Philadelphia, Jane and Boston packet of Kennebunk; we also fell in with, off Cape Dona Maria, and took under convoy, the English ships Glasgow and Caledonia, from Jamaica. Having accompanied the convoy through the Crooked Island passage, as far as Matland's Island, we returned to St. Jago, (having touched at Crooked Island to fill up our water,) on the 21st of June; we sailed from thence on the 22d, and arrived at Trinidad on the 27th.

Sailed from thence on the 4th July, having under convoy the brigs Florida of Boston, Mary and Eliza of Sandwich, schooner Hannah, of Boston, and the French brig Duc d'Angouleme. Parted company with the convoy on the 9th, off Cape Antonio, in order to make the best of our way to Havana, in consequence of the sickly state of the officers and crew, the yellow fever having made its appearance on board on the 6th, of which disease six persons, including Lieut. Commandant Montgomery, have died. More than half the crew were attacked, but most of them have recovered.

On the 20th we arrived at Havana, filled up our water, and sailed same day. On the 22d, arrived at Thompson's Island, and having received the necessary supplies of provisions, sailed from thence on the 24th. You may rest assured, sir, that the the disease did not originate from any local cause. The general regard to cleanliness observed on board the vessel, and Lieut. Com. Montgomery's attention to the comfort of the crew, would impress a belief that it originated from the unhealthiness of the climate, and of the ports we lay in.

I have the honor to enclose you a correspondence between Lieut. Com. Montgomery and the Governor of Trinidad, with other papers; also, a list of the officers and crew of the Beagle.

In consequence of the disability of my right arm from the effects of a violent attack of the yellow fever, from which I am yet much debilitated, I am not able to sign my name, but

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

his ALEX. × B. PINKHAM, Acting Lieutenant.

Commandant D. PORTER, &c., &c., &c.

WASHINGTON, August 11, 1824.

SIR: I have received your communication of the 4th, announcing the arrival of the Beagle, and the melancholy news of the death of Lieut. Montgomery and several of the crew. I hope sincerely that those who have been attacked with the fever may soon recover, and it is my wish that every comfort that they may require may be furnished them, so far as circumstances will permit.

The Beagle must be got ready for sea again with all possible dispatch, and her crew is to be filled up by requisition on the recruiting officer.

Capt. Finch will give you more detailed instructions when necessary.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Acting Lieut. A. B. PINKHAM.

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, July 14, 1823.

SIR: The services of every officer who can attend to duty will be required, on the intended expedition, and I cannot feel myself justifiable in permitting any one to return to the United States as sick, except under a sick ticket from the physician.

Very respectfully, your obedient,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. R. M. POTTER.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, Craney Island, December 30, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed with the United States ship Decoy to Thompson's Island, running down the south side of Cuba. On your arrival there, you will receive further instructions from Master Commandant Jesse Wilkinson, to whom I refer you in all cases of difficulty, either in deciding on the character of vessels you may meet with, or other circumstances. I enclose to you my general instructions as to the duties of officers.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant F. B. GAMBLE.

MATANZAS, May 4, 1824.

SIR: You will proceed to New York with the United States ship Decoy take in a supply of stores for the squadron under my command, and return with all possible dispatch to Thompson's Island.

The men whose terms of service have expired are to be discharged, and others are to be got to supply their places.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant, D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commandant F. B. GAMBLE.

U. S. SHIP PEACOCK, Aguada, March 11, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed with the Sea Gull under your command, accompanied by the Fox, down through the old Straits of Bahama to Thompson's Island.

With great respect, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commandant WM. H. WATSON.

U. S. GALLIOT SEA GULL, Allenton, May 10, 1823.

SIR: You will take command of the barges Gallinipper, Musqueto, and the two schooners Weasel and Fox; with them you will proceed in search of pirates in the old Straits of Bahama. If your provisions will hold out, and circumstances will make it in your opinion necessary and proper, you will extend your cruise so as to make the complete circuit of the island, returning by the way of Antonio.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieutenant Commandant WM. H. WATSON.

Lieutenant Commandant Watson to Commodore Porter.

U. S. GALLIOT SEA GULL, Allenton, Thompson's Island, July 11, 1823.

SIR: Having had the honor to report the circumstances attending the cruise of the division under my orders, prior to our separation off St. John de los Remedios, I have now to communicate, for your information, my subsequent proceedings in the barges Gallinipper and Musquito.

After a strict examination of the coast and islands, from Cayo Francis to Cayo Blanco, in the vicinity of Point Hycacos, whilst cruising in Siguapa Bay, we discovered a large topsail schooner, with a launch in company, working up to an anchorage, at which several merchant vessels were then lying. Being to windward, I bore up in the Gallinipper for the purpose of ascertaining their characters, and, when within gun-shot, perceiving the large vessel to be well armed and her deck filled with men, I hoisted our colors, on seeing which, they displayed the Spanish flag, and the schooner having brailed up her foresail, and commenced firing at the Gallinipper, I immediately kept away and ran down upon her weather quarter, making signal at the same time for the Musquito to close. Having much the advantage in sailing, they did not permit us to do so, but made all sail before the wind for the village of Siguapa, to which place we pursued them, and, after a short action, succeeded in taking both vessels, and effecting the almost total destruction of their crews, amounting, as nearly as could be ascertained at the time, to fifty or sixty men; but, as we are since informed, to seventy or eighty. They engaged us without colors of any description, having hauled down the Spanish flag after firing the first gun; and, on approaching to board (our men giving three cheers and discharging their muskets), the pirates fled precipitately, some to their launch (lying in shore, from whence a fire was still kept up), whilst others endeavored to escape by swimming to the land. A volley of musketry, directed at the launch, completed their disorder, and drove them into the sea; but the boats going rapidly through the water cut off their retreat, with the exception of fifteen, eleven of whom were killed or desperately wounded, and taken prisoners by our men who landed in pursuit, and the remaining four apprehended by the local authorities and sent to Matanzas.

The larger vessel was called the Catilini, commanded by the celebrated pirate Diabolito, taken some weeks since from the Spaniards, between Havana and Matanzas, carried to Siguapa Bay, where she received her armament; had captured nothing, this being the commencement of her piratical cruise.

I cannot close this communication without performing a most pleasing task, in reporting the active gallantry and good conduct of my officers and men, none of whom sustained the slightest injury in the action, the result of which is, I trust, sufficient to satisfy you that all under my orders did their duty, particularly when it is considered that we had but twenty-six men opposed to a force of piratical vessels well supplied with arms of all kinds, amongst which was one long nine and two six-pounders.

I have much pleasure in naming as my associates Lieutenant Inman, Acting S. Master Bainbridge, Dr. Babbit, Midshipmen Harwood and Taylor, and Messrs. Webb and Grice, who obeyed and executed all orders and signals with a promptitude and zeal which could not be exceeded.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. H. WATSON.

Commodore D. PORTER, commanding U. S. Naval Forces in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico.

[Extract.]

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, July 13, 1823.

SIR: You will take command of the barges Gallinipper, Musqueto, Midge, Sand Fly, Grab-all, and Decibolita, and get them ready for sea with all dispatch. When ready, you will please to inform me.

The Gallinipper and Musqueto will be manned from this vessel; the Midge from the Hornet, and the Sand Fly and others from the ships which may hereafter arrive.

Directed to Lieut. Commandant WM. H. WATSON.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, Thompson's Island, April 21, 1824.

SIR: If, on your arrival at Jamaica, our merchants there should have any considerable amount of specie to transport either to St. Jago, Havana, or the United States, you are at liberty to depart from my instructions of this date, so far as to accommodate them with a conveyance for it in your vessel, giving me, or the commanding officer here, the earliest intelligence on the subject.

I have read to you the instructions of the honorable Secretary of the Navy, relative to the transportation of treasures. I have no apprehension that you will go beyond the authority given. It is therefore needless to make any further communication on the subject. I will merely remark, however, that none of the vessels of war, under my command, must, on any account whatever, and under any inducements, be used for the purposes of commercial adventure. You can carry treasure of our citizens from one port or place to another, and you can take it to the United States, but nothing in the shape of public advertisements must appear; and in all your intercourse with the authorities of the places you may visit, make frank acknowledgments of the motives which brought you there. Let all your transactions in this respect be open, and not liable to misapprehension. Nothing, whatever, in the shape of clandestine shipments must be countenanced.

For the information of the government, you will, on joining me, report to me the amount of treasures on board your vessel, where taken from, where destined, and the circumstances, terms and conditions on which you have taken them.

Wishing you a pleasant and profitable cruise, I am, very respectfully,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant N. L. MONTGOMERY.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, Thompson's Island, April 12, 1824.

SIR: You will proceed with the United States schooner Grayhound, under your command, to Matanzas, and thence to Havana, with the enclosed general order, which you will show to the commanders of such of the small schooners as may be at either of these places, or as you may meet with on the coast.

You will collect all the letters and papers at Matanzas and Havana for the squadron, and send them over to this place in one of the schooners.

From Havana you will proceed to the west end of Cuba, anchoring near Cape Antonio, and there wait the arrival of the barges, under the command of Captain Wilkinson, from whom you will receive your further instructions.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant RAY.

MATANZAS, May 4, 1824.

SIR: You will proceed to Havana, with the United States schooner Grayhound, and there receive on board such specie as may offer for the United States, at 2 per cent. freight. You will be particularly careful that nothing in the shape of advertisements are put forth, and that no clandestine shipments are made; and you will make me an accurate return of the amount taken on board, the names of the shippers, and all the circumstances attending the same, in order that I may transmit it to the government.

When ready for sea, you will proceed to New York, land the specie, and deliver the Grayhound to the commandant of the Navy yard, to be coppered and repaired. As soon as her repairs, &c., are completed, you will return to Thompson's Island, by the way of St. Bartholomews and St. Thomas.

Very respectfully, &c.,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Lieut. Commandant RAY.

Commodore Porter to Captain John Porter.

U. S. SHIP PEACOCK, March 4, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed to the port of St. John's, in the harbor of Porto Rico, and deliver the accompanying letter to the governor.

You will there wait, if necessary, two days for the answer, apprising him of your intention so to do; and at the expiration of that time you will proceed to join me, either off the harbor, or at the port of Aguada, at the west end of the island, where I shall water the squadron.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. PORTER.

To Captain JOHN PORTER, U. S. Schooner Grayhound.

U. S. SHIP PEACOCK, Aguada, March 11, 1823.

SIR: You will proceed with the United States schooner Grayhound, under your command, to Thompson's Island, taking with you the Ferret, Terrier, and Weasel.

You will run down the south sides of St. Domingo and Cuba, giving the coasts of both these islands a thorough examination.

You will remain at Thompson's Island until my arrival.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

Captain JOHN PORTER.

MATANZAS, June 6, 1824.

SIR: Being about to return to Washington, and the season when we may expect sickness approaching, I have to direct that such of the small vessels as are now absent from this neighborhood are to be directed to repair to New York as fast as they may arrive at the island. The Ferret, Lieut. Com. McIntosh, is to remain on the station, as also the Grayhound, on her return from New York. The Wild Cat, Lieut. Com. Legare, I shall, from Washington, direct to return to the station immediately, where she will remain subject to my further orders. Of the large vessels, the Hornet and Porpoise have been directed to remain in the neighborhood of Havana, Matanzas, and Thompson's Island, for the protection of our commerce. All the rest will proceed to New York, with the exception of the Decoy, which ship will remain at Thompson's Island for my further orders. The cargo she may bring out is to be disposed of in the stores to the best advantage.

You will keep me regularly informed, by every opportunity, of the occurrences on the station, its state, and condition.

It is probable my return to the island will be about the last of October or the beginning of November.

I hope, sir, that everything will be conducted with the greatest economy and prudence, and that nothing will be done to disturb the good understanding which now happily exists between the squadron and the authorities of Cuba.

The completion of the buildings, and other works going on, is to be expedited with all the means in your power.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

To the Commanding Officer at Thompson's Island.

WASHINGTON, August 12, 1824.

SIR: I enclose you a copy of instructions from the Secretary of the Navy, which you will cause to be executed whenever one of the small schooners can be spared for the service.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

The Senior Officer, Thompson's Island.

MATANZAS, July 27, 1824.

SIR: Understanding by the public prints that you have been directed to take the minister to Mexico, I have to direct that (after the performance of this service, or any other confided to you by the Secretary of the Navy,) you remain in the neighborhood of Havana, Matanzas, and Thompson's Island, for the protection of our commerce, until further orders, unless you should have on board moneys belonging to our merchants, destined for the United States; in which case you will proceed to New York, reporting to me your arrival there, should I be in Washington; but in case I shall have left the United States, you will, after landing the money, repair to Thompson's Island, visiting in your way there St. Bartholomew, St. Thomas, coasting down the south side of Porto Rico, St. Domingo and Cuba.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Commanding Officer of the U. S. Schooner Porpoise.

OFFICIAL COMMUNICATIONS BETWEEN COMMODORE PORTER AND THE CONSTITUTED AUTHORITIES OF THE WEST INDIA ISLANDS.

Commodore Porter to the Governor of Porto Rico.

U. S. SHIP PEACOCK, March 4, 1823.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to inform you that, in pursuance of orders from my government, I have taken command of all the United States forces in these seas, for the protection of the commerce of the United States against all unlawful interruptions; to guard the rights, both of property and person, of our citizens, whenever it shall become necessary; and for the suppression of piracy and the slave trade.

As great complaints have been made of the interruption and injury to our commerce by privateers, fitted out from Spanish ports, I must beg your excellency to furnish me with a descriptive list of vessels, legally commissioned to cruise from Porto Rico, with a set of the blank forms of these papers, that I may know how and when to respect them, if I should meet with any of them.

I must also beg your excellency to inform me how far they have been instructed to interrupt our trade with Mexico and the Colombian republic, and whatever instructions or authorities they may have, affecting our commerce generally.

As the suppression of piracy, the principal motive for my visit to these seas, is an object that concerns all nations, (all being parties against them, and may be considered allies,) I confidently look to all for co-operation, whenever it may be necessary, or at least their favorable and friendly support, and to none more than to those most exposed to their depredations; I therefore look with confidence to your excellency for the aid of such means as may be in your power for their suppression; and, in the absence of means, I beg to assure your excellency that, whatever course may be pursued by me, to destroy these enemies of the human race, it will have no other aim; and I shall observe the utmost caution, not to enroach on the rights, or willingly offend the feelings of others, either in substance or in form, in all the measures which may be adopted to accomplish the end in view.

It will afford me sincere pleasure, should I be so fortunate as to fulfill the expectations of my government, and at the same time preserve harmony and a good understanding with those with whom I may be so unfortunate as to come into collision or discussion, in relation thereto; indeed, it will add much to my happiness, if it can be avoided altogether.

That such is my sincere wish, and that the objects set forth by me are the only ones which brought me to these seas, I beg leave to assure your excellency in the most positive and unequivocal terms.

With the highest respect, I have the honor to be

Your excellency's very obedient and humble servant,

DAVID PORTER.

His excellency the GOVERNOR of Porto Rico.

Captain General of Porto Rico to Commodore Porter.

OFFICE OF THE CAPTAIN GENERAL OF PUERTO RICO, March 6, 1823.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I have this moment received the very estimable letter of your excellency, dated the 4th of the present month, in which your excellency has been pleased to communicate to me the important commission which has been entrusted to you by a government that claims the respect of all the territories within its influence.

I have the satisfaction of forwarding to your excellency a nominal report of the privateer vessels which have been armed and dispatched, for the purpose of cruising, by the competent authority in this island, agreeably to the request which your excellency has made me in the letter of that date; and I am extremely sorry to find myself so situated that I cannot comply with the wishes of your excellency in regard to my transmitting to you a set of blank forms, for the purpose of enabling your excellency to know how and when to respect their commissions. The diplomas which they receive come from our court, already signed by his Most Catholic Majesty and the minister to whom this office pertains; leaving, in these cases, the naval authority here limited only to the filling of the blank spaces in them with the name of the captain and of the vessel. Thus situated, it is impossible for me to accede to your circumspect views in this particular object. But, nevertheless, if it should, on occasion, appear requisite to your excellency, the said diplomas or commissions can be examined, together with a blank signature of the captain of this port, in order that a sufficient ground may be established for comparing this signature with those which may be presented, keeping in view the prospectus of those with which the said privateers are cruising.

I am likewise asked by your excellency for information how far my instructions are extended, for interrupting the commerce of the United States with Mexico and the republic of Colombia; and, for your gratification, it is my duty to declare that I find myself sufficiently instructed to state that the blockade, which was established on all the coasts and ports of the provinces of Venezuela, has been raised. Under these circumstances, I consider the commerce of the United States to be in free capacity for an intercourse with that of the places formerly blockaded; reserving, however, for lawful capture, the vessels of any nation which shall be found conveying implements of war to the insurgents, or people disposed to co-operate with them in their military resistance. I can give your excellency no certain information concerning Mexico; but it is my opinion that the circumstances and condition are to be found the same as those of Venezuela.

The very important objects to which your commission into these seas is directed, and your good intention and views, afford me the greatest satisfaction, and hasten me to manifest myself to your excellency, as at the instant I now do, in order to assure you that all within the scope of my authority and faculty in this island, as one of the places most interested in the flourishing of commerce, and the revival, if possible, of good faith and due respect to the property of the citizens.

Trusting that your excellency may be able to fulfill the desires of your government in this important charge, and that they may be ever more and more happy in their election:

I have the honor of being, with the greatest respect,

Your excellency's most attentive and sure servant,

Who kisses your hands, excellentissimo señor,

MIGUEL DE LA TORRE.

Most excellent sir, Commander of the Squadron of the United States, in the offing of this Port, D. DAVID PORTER.

OFFICE OF THE CAPTAIN GENERAL OF PORTO RICO, March 6, 1823.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: At noon, this day, just as I arrived from the village of Caguus, where I received, at eight o'clock this morning, the official letter of the King's lieutenant commandant of this place, advising me of the arrival of the squadron under the command of your excellency, with a disposition to enter this port, I have been inauspiciously informed of the misfortune occurring in the death of the commander of a schooner-of-war belonging to the squadron, which, it seems, persisted in entering the port, notwithstanding his having been warned by the fort to desist from his undertaking, by a discharge of two cannons, the first with a blank cartridge, and the other at an elevation, with a ball. But the garrison, in seeing his obstinacy, followed, with an extraordinary rigor, the orders for hindering the entrance of the squadron till my arrival, according to the determination formed by the said lieutenant of the place yesterday. I wish to persuade the mind of your excellency into a consciousness of the sorrow which this event, so mournful and unfortunate, has caused me; so much the more painful, inasmuch as it has happened in a place in the district under my command, and on an individual under the orders of your excellency, and a citizen of the United States—of a nation with whom, in all acceptations, the Spaniards of both hemispheres are found united.

So unexpected a misfortune, which, it seems, ought never to be feared in friendly establishments, appears to carry on itself a character of criminality, which more and more aggrieves my feelings.

But the juncture of the circumstances which have conspired towards this fatality, according to the information received by me, is such, that, if your excellency will be pleased to examine it with impartiality, you will perceive that, if the facts are not sufficient to mitigate the regret, they are, at least, enough to prove that there has been no intention of failing in regard to your excellency, nor of offending any citizen of the United States, and much less their government.

The lieutenant of the King, and commandant of that place, grounded on various reasons, of which it is not important to trouble your excellency with a citation, but of which, however, I will point out a few, believed that he ought not permit the entering of the squadron until my arrival. One of his motives arose from his recollecting that, during the last year, an expedition was armed, in the ports of North America, against this island, and placed under the command of a man named Decoudray Holstein, which expedition actually went to the port of St. Bartholomew, under the American flag. And, among his other reasons, were the following: It has been reported here that another similar expedition is this year in preparation; that the schooners alluded to, on their entering, yesterday, would not receive the pilots on board unless they practiced with particular plans of the harbor, and the lead in their hand, of which the captain of the port made his complant; that, when the officers came on shore, a rumor was spread that they were saying Spain had ceded this Island, and that of Cuba, to the English, which relation they confirmed to the lieutenant of the King, as he himself has assured me; that their not having presented to him the writing, nor any expression from your excellency, he suspected he had found something alarming in these rumors, and not sufficient proofs that these were national vessels, merely by the uniform in which the officers were dressed.

These are some of the reasons which he has informed me he had in view in not consenting to the entrance of the squadron until my arrival; and, in consequence of them, he dispatched his orders to the Castle of the Moro, not for the purpose of committing hostilities, but merely preventive orders. He sent an adjutant, at half-past six o'clock in the morning, accompanied by an interpreter, on board one of the schooners under the command of your excellency, to entreat her commander to be so good as to call on the government, in order to agree with them on the means and form of making known to your excellency this their determination. Unfortunately, the commander of the American vessel deferred, in the first place, his seeing the lieutenant of the King until one o'clock in the afternoon; and, provoked by the adjutant to view it as an urgent case, and to consider duly the cause of his being disturbed, and of which he was fully informed, this commander promised the adjutant that he would go to the government as soon as he could dress himself. By an unheard of fatality, he did not accomplish this promise until after his hearing the firing of the cannons at the Moro, which might have been avoided had he only presented himself for an interview with the commandant of the place.

The remissness of this officer, and the pertinacity of him who commanded the schooner, in his not suspending his entering, in spite of the cannon that was fired without a shot, and without waiting for a pilot; but notwithstanding this, and the second discharge of a gun, at an elevation, to crowd sail, in order, at all events, to gain the port; these acts, most excellent sir, have been the means of depriving the United States of a citizen, your excellency of an officer, of filling Puerto Rico with mourning, and myself with inexpressible sorrow. I feel it to be my duty to assure your excellency that the orders issued by the lieutenant of the King, and commandant general of the place, were by no means intended to commit hostilities or offence against the vessels; but as the firing was made at an elevation, either the tumbling of the sea, or perhaps some bad pointing, must have been the cause why the fourth discharge should produce such a fatal effect.

Immediately on my return to this place, I gave orders that all the vessels under the command of your excellency, of whatever description, may enter freely into this harbor, as into a port of friends, where they will meet that reception which the law of nations assigns to those who claim a title of civilization, and other privileges, secured by the treaties of friendship existing between the two nations. In this act, I anticipate for myself the satisfaction of being able to manifest, personally, all the consideration which your person merits from me, and my regret for so mournful and disagreeable an event.

May God preserve your excellency many years, excellentissimo señor.

MIGUEL DE LA TORRE.

To the most excellent Commander-in-Chief of the Anglo-American Squadron, in the offing of Puerto Rico, D. DAVID PORTER.

OFFICE OF THE CAPTAIN GENERAL OF PUERTO RICO, March 7, 1823.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: One of the first objects of my attention, as soon as I was informed of the mournful accident concerning which I wrote to your excellency in my letter of yesterday, was to acquaint myself with the actual condition of the wounded individual, in order that he should be located where the duties of friendship might be exercised for his accommodation and comforts; but, being certified that he had died, during the transaction before related, I could do no otherwise than give my orders that his funeral should be conducted with all the decorum and manifestation of respect due to an honorable officer of his character and station; and causing his corpse to be attended to the grave by a procession, composed of the principal chieftains, authorities, and other officers of this garrison. In this act, I could wish that your excellency might recognize an expression of the lively sorrow which has been excited in me by this misfortune.

May God preserve your excellency many years, excellentissimo señor.

MIGUEL DE LA TORRE.

To the most excellent Commander-in-Chief of the Anglo-American Squadron, in the offing of this port, D. DAVID PORTER.

Commodore Porter to the Governor of Porto Rico.

U. S. SHIP PEACOCK, Aguada, March 8, 1823.

To his excellency the Governor of Porto Rico:

YOUR EXCELLENCY: On the 3d of this month I dispatched from the squadron under my command the United States schooner Grayhound, commanded by Captain John Porter of the United States Navy, who was the bearer of a letter from me to your excellency, written in strict conformity with instructions which I had received from my government, propounding certain inquiries to enable your excellency to put me in possession of such information as would place it in my power to fulfill the benevolent intentions of the Government of the United States, without infringing on the rights of Spain as a belligerent.

The commander of the Grayhound was directed to remain in St. John's two days, for your excellency's answer, and then to join me off the port, or at this place, where I proposed watering the squadron under my command.

On the second day after his arrival at St. Johns, I directed the commander of the United States schooner Fox to proceed there with his vessel to ascertain what time it was probable your reply would be obtained, with orders to return immediately, and apprise the commander of the United States schooner Beagle, another of my squadron, of my intention to come to this place.

On the arrival of the Fox within gun-shot of the castle, I was much surprised to observe that six guns were fired at her; but, knowing of no cause to justify such an act of violence, I should have thought that perhaps I might have been mistaken, had not the commanders of all three of those vessels failed to obey my instructions, which could not have happened but for some violent detention by the authorities at St. Johns.

Until I am better satisfied of the fact, however, I shall refrain from the expression of my sentiments on the subject, and shall, for the present, merely observe that their character could not have been misunderstood: as my squadron, at the time of the departure of the Fox, was laying in full view of the castle, with their colors flying, and a British squadron, under the command of Sir Thomas Cochrane, which had several times communicated with me, and well knew the vessels, arrived there the day previous to the last-mentioned vessel, and on the day previous to my arrival off the port.

I know not whether my suspicions are correct; but I have, in the event of their being so, directed the senior officers to abandon the vessels and leave the Island of Porto Rico as soon as possible, leaving it to my country, to whom I shall make known the facts, to resent the outrage as it may think proper, and which it will, no doubt, do promptly and effectually.

Your excellency must be aware that it is always in my power to retaliate, and even in this place; but it would be a poor return for the friendship and hospitality I have received from its inhabitants, and I cannot reconcile it to myself that the innocent should be made to suffer for offences not their own.

With great respect, I have the honor to be your excellency's most obedient humble servant,

D. PORTER.

Commodore Porter to the Captain General of Porto Rico.

U. S. SHIP PEACOCK, Aguada, March 11, 1823.

To his excellency the Captain General of Porto Rico:

YOUR EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your several favors of the 6th and 7th of this month.

That which is in reply to the letter I had the honor to address you on the 4th, is perfectly satisfactory in all its details; and the promptness with which you have been pleased to attend to it, as well as its contents, will, no doubt, be highly gratifying to the Government of the United States.

I know not how to touch on the melancholy subject of your other letters, without giving vent to some of those feelings which operate at this moment on my mind. I shall endeavor, however, to treat it coolly and dispassionately, and hope, by a few facts, to convince your excellency that there was not the shadow of an excuse for interdicting the entrance of my squadron into the harbor of St. John's; that nothing can justify the order issued by your second in command, to fire upon any of the vessels composing it; and that the act of firing was, to say the least of it, an act of the most unpardonable cruelty and barbarity. It is painful to me to see that your excellency has labored to justify the act, and to throw the blame on the commander of one of the United States vessels, then in port.

A statement in the Echo of the 8th, drawn by the same hand that penned your letter to me, is given to the public, with the same object in view. Your excellency may have reasoned yourself into a belief of the correctness of the inferences you have in both cases drawn from information given you, or both may have been considered as necessary and proper to prevent excitement; but I must be excused for saying to your excellency that the charge is only an aggravation to the outrage which had already been committed. It was not the duty of that officer to move at the beck and call of the King's lieutenant, or to leave the duty unexecuted which I had sent him to perform, to communicate to me the hostile intentions of a subaltern, which, had they been fully explained to him, he never could have believed he would have dared to have carried into effect; but they never were explained, and no such conversation took place between the King's lieutenant and the American officer as is related by your excellency. Your excellency has been misinformed on the subject; and had it taken place, and had it been the duty of the American officer to have communicated to me the intention to prevent my coming into port, it would have been impracticable for him to have executed it, as the sea raged with such violence at the time that no vessel or boat could possibly have left the harbor.

It is not magnanimous in your excellency to resort to such means to excuse the bad conduct of those under your command.

The officer you would implicate was the bearer of a dispatch from me to your excellency, apprising you of the benevolent intentions of my government in fitting out the squadron I have the honor to command.

He had been two days in your port, and was possessed of a copy of my letter to you, which had been seen by your second in command at the moment of presenting himself to him, which was on the day of his arrival; and if any doubts existed as to his character, or to the character of the vessel under his command, being in the power of the authorities of Porto Rico, they could easily have satisfied themselves. But he had been received and treated as an American officer; and it is only to endeavor to palliate or excuse the conduct of the offending individual, that your excellency has sought for facts, which would never have been brought into notice but for the lamentable circumstance which gave rise to these painful remarks.

He informed your second of the character of my squadron; a British squadron was then lying in the port, which knew me, and, there cannot be a doubt, had communicated intelligence of my intentions to visit Porto Rico.

The sloop-of-war, on board which my pendant was flying, with some small vessels of my squadron, were lying in full view of the castle, with their colors hoisted; the schooner which was fired into was standing directly into port, in open day; she could not have escaped, after the first shot was fired, or have given up her intention of going into St. John's, had she been so disposed, or had she understood what was intended by the firing. But, let me ask your excellency, who for an instant could have supposed that a small schooner, of scarcely forty tons burthen, mounting only three guns, with a complement of twenty-five officers and men, would have occasioned any alarm to the city of St. John's, surrounded as it is by fortresses, rendered as impregnable as nature and the art of man can make them? Was it not more natural to believe that the firing was intended to compel her approach? And, even if the intention was not complied with, ought not her feeble condition to have claimed from those in your fortress some mercy? But, no! the vessel, after the death of her lamented commander, was compelled to anchor between the forts, where a tremendous sea was running, which jeopardized the lives of every one on board; to send the small boat on shore, where the young midshipman who commanded her was insulted, by having a heavy gun pointed at the boat, and threatened with destruction if he attempted to move from his position. He was then taken, like a criminal, and placed under guard.

These are facts, your excellency, and incontrovertible ones.

Let me ask your excellency what better proofs you have of the character of my squadron now than were produced on the first day of the arrival of the officer you wish to implicate? What further examination has been made, that the authorities of Porto Rico are better satisfied of our being Americans now than they were before? None.

I repeat it, that the character of my squadron was well known in St. John's. Even in this obscure place, I found American newspapers containing all the details respecting it; and at St. Thomas I saw persons direct from St. John's, who informed me that its equipment and object were well known there. There has, in fact, been a degree of publicity given to the expedition, and an interest felt in it, that have been rarely equaled. The whole of the civilized world was interested in its success. It is in vain, then, to say that we were taken for lawless invaders; and it is unjust to stain the character of my country by a charge of the frequency of hostile expeditions against the Spanish possessions, or offer them as an excuse for the conduct of the offender. Bad men escape sometimes the vigilance of the most rigid authorities, and no government deserves reproach when it does its utmost to detect and bring them to punishment.

I find your coasts lined with troops, since my arrival here. I find reinforcements daily coming in, as I am informed by your order, to protect the inhabitants from my resentment. I have found every precaution taken to keep me in profound ignorance of the lamentable occurrence, but these things were all in vain. I saw the insult offered to the flag of my country. I have satisfied your military commanders that their force is despicable when compared to that at my disposal, and I have convinced the inhabitants that, although they are at my mercy, they will not be made answerable for the offence of an individual.

It is not, then, becoming to the character of your excellency to resort to subterfuge, in order to divert the odium of the act from one officer, to attach blame to another.

I will further ask, why a rigor should be exercised towards vessels bearing the American flag, that was not extended to the British squadron, or to the French frigate which arrived subsequent to the attack on Lieut. Com. Cocke? In the one case there was only a small schooner to fire at; in the other, there were vessels of force!

Had he fallen in battle, and by the hand of a declared enemy, we should have been reconciled to his fate by the proud satisfaction that he died in the performance of his duty to his country; but, to be thus cruelly torn from us, and by the hand of a dastard, whose aim was the more sure from a confidence in his own safety and the defenceless condition of his object, admits of no consolation.

Your excellency, in conversation with the officer you wish to implicate, adverted to the affair of the Panchita as some palliation for the offence; and there is too much reason to apprehend that the officer who gave the order to prevent the entrance of my squadron, as well as those who executed it, thought this a fair opportunity to retaliate. Otherwise, why heat shot in the furnaces to destroy my squadron? Why open two batteries on the schooner, and why fire round shot and langrage while the lamented victim was hailing the fort? And why the remark of the man who pointed the gun, that the shot was intended to avenge the Panchita?

Your excellency will recollect that, in the case of the Panchita, there was an equality of force. Such an occurrence would not have taken place had there been as great a disparity as in the present instance. The cases are not, therefore, parallel; and if the satisfaction of retaliation was sought for, the offenders have failed in their object: it is yet to be obtained.

I shall leave the island to-morrow morning, with a heavy heart, and shall, without delay, communicate to my government the melancholy result of my visit here, which was intended for the benefit of the civilized world in general.

With the highest respect, I have the honor to be,

Your excellency's most obedient humble servant,

D. PORTER.

Commodore Porter to the Captain General of Cuba.

U. S. Ship Peacock, off Matanzas, March 26, 1823.

Your Excellency: I have the honor to inform you that, in pursuance of orders from my government, I have taken command of all the United States naval forces in these seas, for the protection of the commerce of the United States against all unlawful interruptions; to guard the rights, both of property and person, of our citizens, whenever it may become necessary; and for the suppression of piracy and the slave trade.

As great complaints have been made of the interruption and injury of our commerce by privateers, fitted out from Spanish ports, I must beg your excellency to furnish me a descriptive list of vessels legally commissioned to cruise from Cuba, with a set of the blank forms of their papers, that I may know how and when to respect them, if I should meet with any of them.

I must also beg your excellency to inform me how far they have been instructed to interrupt our trade with Mexico and the Colombian republic, and whatever instructions or authorities they may have, affecting our commerce generally.

As the suppression of piracy, the principal motive of my visit to these seas, is an object that concerns all nations, (all being parties against them, and may be considered allies,) I confidently look to all for co-operation, whenever it may be necessary, or at least their favorable and friendly support, and to none more than those most exposed to their depredations. I therefore look with confidence to your excellency for the aid of such means as may be in your power for their suppression; and, in the absence of means, I beg leave to assure your excellency, that whatever course may be pursued by me to destroy those enemies of the human race, it will have no other aim; and I shall observe the utmost caution not to encroach on the rights, or willingly to offend the feelings, of others, either in substance or form, in all the measures which may be adopted to accomplish the end in view.

It will afford me sincere pleasure, should I be so fortunate as to fulfill the expectations of my government, and at the same time preserve harmony and a good understanding with those with whom I may be so unfortunate as to come in collision or discussion in relation thereto. Indeed it will add much to my happiness if it can be avoided altogether.

That such is my sincere wish, and that the objects set forth by me are the only ones which have brought me to these seas, I beg leave to assure your excellency in the most positive and unequivocal terms.

With the highest respect, I have the honor to be,

Your excellency's very obedient and humble servant,

D. PORTER,

Commanding U. S. Naval Forces in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico.

To his Excellency the Captain General of Cuba.

[Translation.]

HABANA, March 29, 1823.

I feel much satisfaction in your arrival into these seas with the commission explained to me in your official letter of the 26th of the present month, which I am now answering; and I offer you at once a hearty welcome.

You are pleased to manifest that there have been great complaints on account of the mischief committed on your commerce by corsairs fitted out in the Spanish ports, and wish me to furnish you with a description list of the vessels lawfully authorized at the Island of Cuba for cruising; also, a set of blank forms of their papers, in order that you may know how and when to respect them, if you were to fall in with any of them.

In answer I must state, that as this business pertains exclusively to the general marine command, at this station, you will be pleased to address this department for these objects of your requisition.

This government, commodore (Señor Comodoro), anxiously desires, and loses none of the means in their disposal, to prosecute those enemies of the human race, even to annihilation; and you can be well assured that, on all occasions, it is, and will be, ready to lend every aid that is compatible with the territorial rights and privileges of the nations co-operating for the extermination of these freebooters.

Deign to accept the considerations of my respect and friendship.

God preserve you many years.

SEBASTIAN KINDERLAN.

Señor Don D. PORTER, Commander of the Naval Forces of the United States in this sea.

Commodore Porter to the Captain General of Cuba.

HAVANA, April 20, 1823.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: Having been informed that an order has been issued by your excellency to the military commanders of districts in this island, forbidding the entrance into the harbors thereof of the squadron under my command, I have, therefore, to repeat to your excellency, that I came by the orders of the Government of the United States, in aid of the local authorities, for the suppression of piracy, and for no other object, as I have always assured your excellency, and I have to beg of you to prevent any unpleasant consequences from the existence of an order so hostile to the interests of Cuba, and so opposed to the friendly and benevolent intentions of my government, that your excellency will be pleased to cause it to be revoked as early as practicable; and that you will furnish me with a paper, bearing your excellency's signature, whereby the friendly character of the forces under my command may be made understood by the aforesaid military commanders, as well as by all others in authority, with whom I may come in contact; and your excellency will pardon me for urging, with great earnestness, this request, as the knowledge of this order has been the source of great uneasiness to me, particularly since an admission on the part of your excellency confirms its existence.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect,

Your excellency's most obedient and humble servant,

D. PORTER.

To his EXCELLENCY the Captain General of the Island of Cuba.

Commodore Porter to the Captain General of Cuba.

U. S. STEAM VESSEL SEA GULL, Allenton, Thompson's Island, May 16, 1823.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 10th, with the circulars accompanying it; and beg leave to return my sincere thanks for your prompt and satisfactory reply to my application of the 4th of this month, as well as assurances of the high sense I entertain of the favorable disposition of the higher authorities of Cuba towards the squadron under my command, which has been manifested by various acts that have greatly facilitated the execution of the duties entrusted to me; and it is the cause of great regret that I should have been under any erroneous impression with regard to orders of any kind, issued by your predecessor in office, in any way concerning the operations of my forces; and beg leave to offer, as my apology, the assurances of those who had stated to me that they had seen the orders; the admission of the captain general, as understood by [the] officer whom I sent to him on this subject, that orders of a restrictive nature had been issued; the conduct of the commandants of Mariel and Porto Cabanes; and information received from the commandant of Bahia Honda, that some orders with regard to the forces under my command had been received by him. The assurances of your excellency have put the subject forever at rest; and your circulars have relieved my mind from the serious apprehensions under which it labored.

Permit me to embrace this opportunity to felicitate your excellency on your arrival; to assure you that nothing but a severe indisposition has prevented my paying my respects in person; and to offer you my best wishes for your health and happiness.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, your excellency's very obedient servant,

D. PORTER,

Commanding U. S. Naval forces in the W. I. and Gulf of Mexico.

To his excellency Don FRANCISCO DIONISIO VIVES,

Captain General of the Island of Cuba and its Dependencies.

The Captain General of Cuba to Commodore Porter.

[Translation.]

HABANA, May 10, 1823.

In the last conference which you had with his excellency, my predecessor, you, no doubt, became satisfied with the friendly demonstrations and sincere offers of this government to that of the United States, unequivocally expressed by that chieftain, with explanations of the subjects of your doubts relative to his official letter of the 29th of March, in his last paragraph in answer to one from you, dated the 26th of the same month.

Having gained an understanding of this case, I have now the satisfaction of declaring to you that this government has not issued any order for prohibiting the entrance of the vessels, in the squadron under your command, into the ports of this island; but, on the contrary, your squadron will meet with every aid and co-operation, on the part of the local authorities, in the pursuit of pirates who may shelter themselves in the uninhabited coasts, compatible with the territorial privilege, conformable to the laws of nations. And I can do no less than assure you that the Spanish government, always a faithful observer of the rights pertaining to each nation, as well as jealous of their own, never would take measures of the kind to which you allude, without proclaiming their intention with that frankness and clearness which are its strong characteristics; and, in the present case, it has had no motive for acting contrary to the sentiments which it has heretofore expressed to you.

And that you may remain satisfied and convinced, I enclose to you circulars for the different commandants of the military stations on this island, in order that they may afford you all the assistance necessary for the attainment of your important commission. With this, I consider your official letter of the 28th of last month as answered.

This opportunity allows me the pleasure of offering my services to you, with the highest consideration.

God preserve you many years.

FRANCISCO DIONISIO VIVES.

Commodore DAVID PORTER, Commander of the U. S. Squadron.

Translated copy of a circular letter from the Captain General of Cuba to the commandants at the several military stations in that island.

OFFICE OF THE CAPTAIN GENERAL OF THE ISLAND OF CUBA, Habana, May 10, 1823.

An American squadron, under the command of Commodore David Porter, being destined to cruise about the coasts of this island, in aid of our forces, who are engaged in a like enterprise, namely, the purpose of exterminating the pirates who infest our seas, and cause so much injury to commerce in general, without respecting any flag whatever: and it being an obligation of every civilized nation to annihilate such banditti, who, heedless of their duties in society, employ themselves in such execrable practices, I have thought it proper to give orders that, wherever this squadron may arrive, and present itself to the constituted authorities, they must afford it every aid which may be compatible with the territorial privilege and respect.

God preserve you many years.

FRANCISCO DIONISIO VIVES.

HABANA, June 30, 1823.

I have received your official letters, one of which is dated on the 21st and the other on the 24th of the present month. In the latter I observe a complaint of the conduct of the provisionally appointed Governor of Matanzas towards an officer of the sloop-of-war Hornet. I have, consequently, already made arrangements for a close investigation of this subject, in order to convince you that no other sentiments animate this government than what have already been manifested to you on several occasions, and from which it will never deviate; and, likewise, to satisfy you that its views are the same as those of the Government of the United States, in the extirpation of the enemies of the human race who have infested the coasts of this pacific island; and I wish you to be fully persuaded that it will never be able to view with indifference any intentional insult, committed by its subalterns, on the officers of any nation engaged in so laudable an enterprise.

In regard to your letter of the 21st, I would say that I will accomplish the objects of its contents without delay among those who are interested in their respective reclamations, applauding, at the same time, the just comparison which you make, of the rights of a strict neutrality towards the nation whom I have the honor of serving.

I renew to you my most distinguished consideration.

May God preserve you many years.

FRANCISCO DIONISIO VIVES.

To Commodore DAVID PORTER.

U. S. GALLIOT SEA GULL, Allenton, Thompson's Island, July 13, 1823.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: With a full confidence that they will be brought to condign punishment, I send you, to be tried by the laws of Spain, five pirates, taken on board two piratical vessels by two of the barges of my squadron. I also send, by the same conveyance, two men, making part of the original crew of one of the vessels when she fell into the hands of the pirates.

The witnesses being on the spot, will enable you to make the punishment prompt, and the example, I have no doubt, will be highly salutary.

With sentiments of the highest respect, I have the honor to be,

Your excellency's very obedient and humble servant,

D. PORTER,

Commanding U. S. Naval Forces in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico.

To his excellency Don FRANCISCO DIONISIO VIVES,

Captain General of the Island of Cuba and its Dependencies.

General Vives to Commodore Porter.

OFFICE OF THE CAPTAIN GENERAL OF THE ISLAND OF CUBA, Habana, July 24, 1823.

I acknowledge the receipt of your official letter of the 13th of the present month, transmitted by the schooner Ferret, with five individuals, under the character of pirates. These men were immediately put under the disposal of the judiciary authority, in order that they might be judged in a manner accordant to our laws; and the judge who was especially charged with the duty has directed to me the following official statement of the result of his examinations:

"MOST EXCELLENT SIR: The commander of the American schooner-of-war the Ferret, Mr. Thomas M. Newell, being examined, likewise the mariners whom he presented before me, and those whom he brought here as prisoners, by order of Commodore D. Porter, of whom three were, by the disposition of your excellency, committed to the jail, and two to the hospital of Saint Ambrosio, characterized as pirates: an appearance has not resulted that they had an actual participation in the invasions and robberies—they were brought to their condition by compulsion. But, as I have information that those who escaped are now apprehended and carried to Matanzas, where a process will be instituted against them, and where the most sure means will be adopted for discovering the plain truth, I have considered it expedient to send these prisoners to Matanzas, hoping that your excellency will be pleased to facilitate their transportation, with the necessary provisions, affording to the disposition of the judge of that district the means of determining, with clear understanding, what has been done and what is now actually doing."

This copy is forwarded to you for your information and satisfaction.

FRANCISCO DIONISIO VIVES.

Commodore DAVID PORTER.

UNITED STATES SHIP JOHN ADAMS, November 12, 1824.

SIR: It has been officially reported to me that an officer under my command, who visited the town of Foxardo, of which you are the chief, in search of robbers and freebooters, who, with a large amount of American property, were supposed to have taken shelter there, and bringing with him sufficient testimonials as to his object and character, was, after they were all made known to you, arrested by your order, by armed men, and shamefully insulted and abused in your presence, by the captain of the port, after which he was sent by your orders to prison, and, when released therefrom, was further insulted and abused by the inhabitants of the town. His object in visiting Foxardo has by these means been defeated, and for these offences no atonement or explanation has yet been made.

The object of my visit is to obtain both, and I leave it entirely to your choice whether to come with the captain of the port and the other offenders to me, for the purpose of satisfying me as to the part you have all had in this shameful transaction, or to await my visit at your town. Should you decline coming to me, I shall take with me an armed force, competent to punish the aggressors, and if any resistance is made, the total destruction of Foxardo will be the certain and immediate consequence.

If atonement for the injury is promptly made, those innocent of the offences will escape all punishment. But atonement must and shall be had, and if it is withheld from me, they will be involved in the general chastisement.

I shall hold the town and vessels in the harbor answerable for any detention or ill treatment of the officer who bears this letter.

I allow you one hour to determine on the course you will pursue, at the expiration of which time, if you do not present yourself to me, I shall march to Foxardo.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your very obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

To the ALCALDE of Foxardo.

UNITED STATES SHIP JOHN ADAMS, Thompson's Island, April 15, 1824.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to transmit you copies of two resolutions of the Congress of the United States, in the House of Representatives, adopted on the 23d of December last, requiring that the Secretary of State be directed to ascertain and report to that House, "whether the rocks called the Double Headed Shot Keys, or any other of the rocks or desert islets near the Bahama banks, but separated therefrom by a deep channel, and in which the security of the navigation of the Gulf of Florida, requiring that light-houses or beacons should be placed, are within the dominions of any and what foreign kingdom or State; or whether they are not now subject to be appropriated by the right of occupancy;" and, secondly, "That the President of the United States be requested to negotiate with the government of Great Britain for a cession of so much land on the Island of Abaco, at or near the Hole in the Wall, and on such other places within the acknowledged dominion of that power, or the islands, keys, or shoals on the Bahama banks, as may be necessary for the erection and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, or floating lights, for the security of navigation over and near the sand banks, and to be used solely for such purposes."

In consequence of these resolutions, and a call made by the Secretary of State on the Secretary of the Navy, the whole subject has been referred to me, with instructions to obtain the necessary information thereon, to be laid before the government, and I have the honor to solicit of your excellency the information called for, with your opinion as to what portion of the Island of Abaco, near the Hole in the Wall, and what other places within the acknowledged dominion of Great Britain on the islands, keys, and shoals, as described in the resolutions, may be necessary for the purposes therein mentioned.

The description of the places should be made with sufficient precision, with regard to topography, to be inserted in the articles of cession, if the consent of Great Britain to make it should be obtained.

Such information as your excellency may be enabled to furnish, without reference to his Britannic Majesty's government, I shall be glad to have as early as convenient; and where reference is necessary, where the information may be obtained, I beg that I may be enabled to lay it before the Government of the United States with as little loss of time as possible, in order that an object so desirable to the commercial world may be promptly undertaken and speedily executed.

I had hoped to have had it in my power to have done myself the honor to make this application in person, but circumstances connected with my public duties deprive me of the pleasure I had anticipated.

With the highest respect, your excellency's obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

To his excellency Major General L. GRANT, Governor of the Bahamas.

OFFICIAL COMMUNICATIONS TO AND FROM THE BRITISH OFFICERS IN THE WEST INDIES.

Sir Thomas Cochrane, Captain of his Britannic Majesty's ship Forte, and commanding a squadron of his Britannic Majesty's ships and vessels at Porto Rico, to Commodore Porter, commanding the United States squadron in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico:

HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S SHIP FORTE, Porto Rico, March 6, 1823.

SIR: I avail myself of the opportunity offered by the United States schooner Grayhound, to return you my best thanks for the ready attention to my communication of the 4th instant, as well as to renew the assurances of my sincere desire to cultivate that harmony and good understanding so happily existing between our respective countries, and in which I am only anticipating what I know would be the commands and wishes of my own government.

The extended view you have taken of the measures necessary to be pursued against pirates, in the orders issued to your sqadron, must entitle you to the thanks of all nations who have commercial relations in these seas.

And I will not fail to communicate to Commodore Sir Edward Owen the signals by which the several vessels of your squadron may be known; and, in conformity to your wishes, I beg leave to enclose a signal, by which the vessels on the leeward island station may be recognized on meeting your cruisers, which I am sure the commodore will cause to be communicated to the ships and vessels under his command, without loss of time.

With sentiments of the highest consideration,

I have the honor to remain, sir, your obedient servant, THOS. COCHRANE.

[Quadruplicate.]

The Commodore Sir Edward W. C. R. Owen, Knight, commander of the most honorable military Order of the Bath, commanding a squadron of his Britannic Majesty's ships and vessels, to Commodore Porter, commanding the naval forces of the United States of North America in the West Indies:

SIR: Captain Sir Thomas Cochrane, of his Britannic Majesty's ship Forte, having represented to me the particulars of his correspondence with you, upon the circumstances which occurred on the occasion of his Majesty's sloop Bellette communicating with the Grayhound, a schooner-of-war belonging to the Government of the United States of North America, and under your command, I have great pleasure in adopting the signals which have been established between you for the recognition of the vessels of each squadron by those belonging to the other; a measure well calculated, not only to prevent unnecessary interruption, but to ensure co-operation, if any case of mutual interest shall require it.

I hope to find in this measure, and in the conciliatory style of your reply to the representation which Captain Sir Thomas Cochrane thought right to make to you, a firm foundation for that confidence, goodwill and harmony with which the officers of friendly powers should meet each other; and I assure you that I shall be at all times happy, in what regards myself, to set a good example of this feeling, and to cultivate in those whom I command the same good disposition with which I have now the honor to subscribe myself,

Sir, your very obedient, humble servant, E. W. C. R. OWEN.

On board his Britannic Majesty's Ship the Gloucester, in Carlisle Bay, Barbadoes, March 22, 1823.

N. B.—Copy of an order issued with them is enclosed.

[Extract.]

Extract from a report made by Captain Maclean, of his Majesty's brig Bustard, to Commodore Sir Edward Owen, K. C. B., dated—

HAVANA, July 5, 1823.

E. W. C. R. Owen, Commodore:

On the 9th of June, the Speedwell came off the fort, when she was dispatched to Manati. On that day the United States schooners-of-war Fox and Weasel, with two barges similar to ours, arrived, under the orders of Lieut. Watson, the commander of the steamboat Sea Gull. He waited upon me, and most handsomely offered to place his force under my orders, which I would not accept of, but stated, as we were employed upon a similar service, we could mutually consult what measures were best to be observed, and the pleasure we all felt in acting in concert.

We were together some time, and they never did anything without consulting me, and the utmost unanimity and friendship were observed. On the 10th sailed from Nilarra, two squadrons in company, which were dispersed along the coast. On the afternoon of the 11th, we all anchored at Nuevitas.

It took us to the 13th making various researches, and boarding various vessels at the upper part of the harbor, which extends five leagues.

We that day proceeded to Cayo Confites together, and on the morning of Saturday, at daylight, observed two ships on shore, on the Chesterfield reef, Cayo Verde. We immediately dispatched all our boats, and found them to be the American ship Warrington, L. Dillingham, master, from Bordeaux to Havana, and the Hamburg ship Cæsar, W. James, from Hamburg to Havana. They had got on shore that morning at 4 o'clock. After every exertion was used to extricate them, without effect, we were under the necessity of getting what cargo we could on shore on Cayo Verde, and commenced their destruction, to prevent pirates equipping from the wrecks.

The Americans dispatched, by mutual wish, the Weasel for New Providence, to provide vessels to carry away the cargoes, which were most valuable, at least from two to three hundred thousand dollars; but from the linens getting wet made them of little value. On the 18th I dispatched the barge to visit all the keys and inlets to Boca Lagua la Grande, proceeding with the Bustard towards Ginger Key, on Bahama bank, and left the Speedwell, with the American schooner Fox, and two barges, to protect the property on Cayo Verde. I anchored that night on the bank, and the following morning had the misfortune to break my anchor in purchasing it. We were anchored in a bottom of sand and limestone.

It affords me much pleasure in stating the manner and conduct observed by the United States squadron when we were at work on the wrecks, as also on shore at Cayo Verde, where we had guards placed, and the officers observed each others orders according to rank, and our respective crews went to the senior officer for order and to make their reports while employed personally on board the wrecks or on shore.

The American commander invariably came to me, before commencing any new service, for my sanction. They got their vessels under way to pick our boats up, let us make use of their pilots, and considered our squadrons as one.

The Commodore, Sir Edward W. C. R. Owen, Knight, commander of the most honorable military Order of the Bath, and Commander-in-Chief of his Britannic Majesty's ships and vessels employed in the West Indies and seas adjacent, to Commodore Porter, commanding the naval forces of the United States of North America, in the West Indies:

SIR: The chief command of his Britannic Majesty's ships and vessels in these seas having devolved on me by the return of Rear Admiral Sir Charles Rowley to Great Britain, I avail myself of the occasion of his Majesty's ship Tyne, passing near the rendezvous of the squadron under your command, to make known to you that circumstance, and to repeat to you the assurance that I shall always have great pleasure in cultivating with yourself, and between the officers and others we respectively command, that confidence and amicable feeling, which it is no less my inclination than my duty to preserve, by all means in my power.

I take the opportunity, at the same time, to enclose you the counterpart of a letter which I had the honor of writing to you from Barbadoes, and which has been forwarded by several vessels with the hope of reaching you.

I beg, also, further to acquaint you that, after a patient investigation in a court of vice admiralty in this island, the captain and nineteen of the crew of the pirate schooner Zaragozana, captured by the boats of his Majesty's ships Tyne and Thracian, after communicating with you in the Bahama channel in the month of March, have been condemned to death.

And, that the trial of three others, forming, with the exception of those who gave evidence, the remainder of those captured by the boats, has been deferred, to allow them to procure some proof which they consider will be favorable to them.

This, together with the numerous vessels which have been destroyed of late, I hope will give a check to the nefarious practices of these remorseless depredators, and relieve the peaceful trader from all fear of future outrage.

And, in the hope of seeing this great end accomplished by the exertions of the several individuals we respectively command, in which we may preserve a commendable rivalry, I have the honor to subscribe myself, sir, your very obedient and humble servant,

E. W. C. R. OWEN.

On board his Britannic Majesty's Ship the Gloucester, in Port Royal Harbor, Jamaica, May 19, 1823.

Commodore Sir Edward W. C. R. Owen, Knight, commander of the most honorable military Order of the Bath; Commander-in-Chief of his Britannic Majesty's ships and vessels employed in the West Indies and the seas adjacent, to Commodore Porter, commanding the naval forces of the United States of North America, in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico:

SIR: I avail myself of the arrival of the schooners Grayhound and Beagle, to acknowledge the receipt of the letter which you did me the honor to address to me on the 12th of June last, inclosing one for Captain Sir Thomas Cochrane, commanding his Britannic Majesty's ship the Forte; and I shall not fail to transmit the gratifying assurance which it contains, that the respect it was his pride and duty to show to the remains of a gallant officer, whose estimable qualities had endeared him to his brethren and to those who best could estimate his worth, had been received with satisfaction by yourself and the several officers under your command.

He will receive, with pleasure, that testimony of the interest which you take in promoting and improving the sentiments of mutual good-will which hitherto have marked the intercourse of the vessels of our respective squadrons, a disposition which, I trust, the confidence that we reciprocally manifest will confirm and render still more perfect.

I am happy to enclose you a gratifying proof of this improving sentiment of good-will in an extract from a report which has been made to me by Captain Maclean, of his Majesty's brig-of-war Bustard, making known to me how perfectly a small detachment from your force, commanded by the Lieut. Commandant Watson, has co-operated with him in the service which I had entrusted to his guidance; and I beg that I may be permitted to express the pleasure that communication has afforded me.

I am happy, further, to acquaint you that a piratical schooner, which had been cruising in the vicinity of the Isle of Pines, was driven on shore, and captured by the schooners Lion and Union, under my command, on the 5th June; and, though the crew escaped on shore, I am glad to learn by some Cuba papers, that a party which had been ordered by the commandant of Trinidad to pursue them into the interior, had been successful in taking a considerable number of them.

I cannot close this letter without offering you my congratulations on the success attending the exertions of Captains Kearney and Newton in destroying the piratical establishment at Cape Cruz, in which vicinity a row-boat had, a short time back, been stated to have robbed some smugglers.

Although your squadron has not been fortunate in capturing the crews of pirates, who, since the affair of the Zaragozana, are cautious in committing themselves, by a resistance which denies escape, yet the judgment with which your squadron is distributed, and the perseverance which your officers have shown, under circumstances of great deprivation, have not been unrewarded; and, to these causes, we may attribute truly a considerable portion of the comparative security which the merchant vessels, passing through the gulf, have felt since its arrival.

I trust success will still mark the exertions it is making for the general benefit.

I have the honor to remain, with sentiments of sincere respect,

Your very obedient humble servant,

E. W. C. R. OWEN.

On board his Britannic Majesty's ship Gloucester, in Port Royal Harbor, Jamaica, July 28, 1823.

To Commodore Porter, commanding the naval forces of the United States of North America, in the West Indies:

HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S SHIP GLOUCESTER, in Port Royal Harbor, Jamaica, Sept. 23, 1823.

SIR: I have had no opportunity since the arrival of his Majesty's brig the Bustard, of forwarding to you the sincere acknowledgments that I so justly owe you, for the kindness and attention which you lavished on that vessel's sick and helpless crew, when her captain thought it right to seek refuge at your rendezvous.

In my own name and that of Captain Maclean, and of every officer and man belonging to her, I beg you will accept my warmest thanks, not only as the attentive care with which you watched the progress of that afflicting malady was consoling to the sufferers in the depression which attends disease, but as your own experience was made useful in the anticipation, and your stores were generously applied to the removal of their wants, even to your own deprivation, in cases where the infant state of your establishment did not enable it to supply them otherwise.

I have charged Captain Stafford, of his Majesty's sloop Carnation, if he has the good fortune to meet you, personally to repeat how sensibly I feel and how highly I value the humane and liberal sentiments which have governed you herein.

The necessities of the Bustard took largely from your supply of medicines and medical comforts: these I request permission to replace; and as arrow-root and castor-oil are native productions here, and not only abundant, but I hope good, I have given directions for a small quantity of each to be put up, and I request you will do me the favor to apply it to the comfort of any of your people who require it.

Whilst I sincerely hope that no case will happen to call on us for a return of kindness such as leaves me now so much your debtor, I will likewise hope all future intercourse between the officers of our respective services may be marked like this—by frank and liberal sentiments, such as best can soften prejudice and lead them to a just and proper estimation of each other.

It will be my duty to lay the report of Captain Maclean before the lords commissioners of the admiralty of the United Kingdom, in doing which I shall have pleasure likewise in repeating the sentiments I here convey to you, as I have now in renewing the expressions of consideration and esteem with which I have the honor to remain, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

E. W. C. R. OWEN,

Commodore Commander-in-Chief of H. B. M. Ships and Vessels in the West Indies.

Captain Roberts, of his Majesty's ship Thracian, presents his compliments to the American commodore, and would have had the pleasure of waiting on him, but is indisposed.

He begs to inform the commodore that the vessels at anchor are H. M. ships Tyne and Thracian—that all the boats of both ships are away on the coast, under Captain Wolcott, of the former ship. They have been away three days, and are expected back. Both ships have been on the coast, this side of Anguilla, for five weeks, and have taken nothing. The boats have been often away; and about nine days back, being off Ensenachos, the Thracian's boats chased amongst the keys a small schooner and three row boats, having with them a merchant sloop, apparently American. Not knowing the coast sufficiently, the boats could find no passage within sand banks, and were obliged to carry them over three. The sloop was aground, and threw all her cargo overboard, consisting of flour; but the other vessels went away to westward, within the keys, with a breeze. Night coming on, and it blowing strong from the north-northeast, the boats returned.

Captain Roberts will feel obliged to the commodore for any information or papers; and if he has anything to send to Jamaica, will be happy to convey it, as the ships are about to proceed there shortly.

H. M. S. THRACIAN, March 19, 1823.

H. B. M. S. BUSTARD, Key West, July 23, 1823.

SIR: I beg leave to acquaint you that, in cruising in the old Bahama channel with a small squadron under my orders, I had the good fortune to meet at Port Xilarra with a detachment of yours, under the orders of W. H. Watson, Esq., employed upon a similar service to myself; we were together a considerable time; and on two merchant ships being wrecked upon a reef of Cayo Verde, it afforded us the pleasing opportunity of acting in junction, both afloat and on shore, and I feel most sincere satisfaction in having the honor of reporting the unanimity and cordiality which were invariably observed. To Captain Watson I consider myself personally indebted for his friendly attention, and desire of keeping up an interchange of information which is most gratifying for officers to meet with from each other when pursuing the same object. I have come to this anchorage for the express purpose of making this communication, and felt a pleasing duty representing the same to Commodore Sir Edward Owen, whose orders to me were to co-operate with your forces, if it met the wishes of those officers I might have the pleasure of meeting with.

I have the honor to be, with every sentiment of respect and esteem, sir,

Your most obedient and very humble servant,

R. MACLEAN, Commander.

Commodore PORTER, &c., &c., &c.

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, July 25, 1823.

DEAR SIR: I have the pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 23d, communicating the circumstances of your co-operation with part of my forces in the old Straits in the pursuit of pirates, and in the rescue of the cargoes of two merchant ships, wrecked near Key Verde, of your satisfaction in reporting the cordiality which prevailed, and making an offer of future co-operation.

On the return of Lieutenant Commandant Watson from his expedition, the representations made by him to me of the conduct of yourself and officers, on all transactions wherein you were mutually engaged, was most gratifying to me, and gave me a high opinion of your character, which I find loses nothing on acquaintance.

It will afford me, as I am sure it will every officer under my command, sincere pleasure to co-operate with you, or any other British officer, against our common enemy, so long as the same cordiality of feeling which has been manifested by you shall prevail.

It will be highly gratifying to me if the British officers on this station will visit our little establishment more frequently, and although we have not much to offer them, we can assure them of a hearty welcome.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, your very obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

To Captain R. MACLEAN, H. B. M. Brig Bustard.

H. M. S. BUSTARD, Thompson's Island, August 8, 1823.

DEAR SIR: Your having placed in my hands an account transmitted you of an act of piracy, committed by the capture of the American brig Two Brothers, of Newburyport, I beg leave to acquaint you, for the information of those concerned, that upon the 11th of May last I visited Cumberland harbor, in the southeast end of Cuba, with H. B. M. sloop under my command, and found a vessel precisely the description; she was at anchor in the river Augusta, about a mile and a half from the entrance, and had been removed there by the Spanish authorities, whose charge she was under; the pirates had plundered her of everything on their abandonment at that port. The particulars of her capture by them was furnished me in a conversation with Don Jose De Lara, captain of the party at the district of Ma. Catalina, as also by Corn's O'Callaghan, a planter in that neighborhood, and the fishermen in the harbor; their depositions appear to coincide exactly with the description and account you have furnished me of the said vessel. The commandant, (or captain of the party, as he is called,) further informed me, that some of the pirates who brought her in had been apprehended, and sent to the authorities of St. Jago de Cuba. I sincerely trust this may lead to the condign punishment of such an execrable act,

And have the honor to remain with esteem, dear sir, yours, most respectfully,

R. MACLEAN.

To Commodore PORTER, &c., &c., &c.

H. M. S. CARNATION, Havana, January 10, 1825.

MY DEAR SIR: Your kind and obliging favor of the 3d inst. I have had the pleasure of receiving, and feel happy to hear of your good health. The improvements you are making at Thompson's Island will be of great use to the naval establishment; I regret to hear from Lieutenant Liandet you have several cases of intermitting fever in the hospital, but I am in hopes, when you clear away a little more wood and drain the swamps, the place will become healthy. We have no news of consequence here. Several reports of piracy, notwithstanding our numerous force round the island. We have five vessels of war upon the south side, and the same number on this; but, excepting we have a proper co-operation from the shores of Cuba, it is my opinion the united navy of America and England would not effectually suppress piracy; they ought to insist upon hanging a few of the villains (who are now in confinement here for that crime,) at the entrance of some of the principal harbors in this island; such an example would be attended with universal benefit. A Spanish squadron, consisting of a frigate and two corvettes, will leave this upon Wednesday for the Castle of San Juan de Ulloa, taking down five hundred soldiers; we hear they are in a very bad state there, and without immediate succor must surrender. The Dartmouth frigate, Captain, the Hon. J. A. Maude, has relieved me, and I sail in a few days for Jamaica direct. I cannot yet say where my next cruise will be, but I hope to have an opportunity of visiting the United States shortly. The Dartmouth and three schooners are searching all the old channel of Bahama, and the Ferret is also in that direction. I beg you will offer my best respects to Mrs. Porter and family when you write, as also to Captain Dallas. I shall be happy to be the bearer of any letters, &c., from him to his relations in Jamaica. I shall not leave this before Thursday morning; therefore, if any vessel comes over, he will have an opportunity of writing them.

Believe me always with sincere respect and esteem, my dear sir, yours, truly,

R. MACLEAN.

Commodore D. PORTER, &c., &c., &c.

MISCELLANEOUS CORRESPONDENCE ON THE GENERAL SUBJECT OF PIRACY AND CONVOY, ETC.

TRINIDAD, Cuba, May 19, 1823.

David Porter, Esq.:

DEAR SIR: We have the pleasure of acknowledging the receipt of your esteemed favor of the 16th ultimo, with the enclosed information to American merchants and ship-masters. We are sorry to observe that it is not in your power to send any protection on this side of the island for the present, in consequence of the want of men. We have to assure you one or more small vessels are much wanted to cruise between Cape Cruz, this and Cape Antonio, for the protection of American vessels; at present there are two pirates off cruising between this and Cape Briton Key Quego, and it is impossible for us to say what depredations they may commit on the unarmed American flag, and we are sorry to say there is no armed vessel in port to send after them; we have therefore to hope your immediate attention will be drawn to the safety of American vessels coming and departing from this. We have no doubt but you are acquainted that those piratical vessels are generally fitted out from different ports in this island, and that they have their friends on shore, which in one sense is their protection towards piracy.

We remain, with the greatest respect, your most obedient, humble servant,

TATE S. GRAWNING.

CONSULATE OF UNITED STATES, Alvarado, October 10, 1824.

SIR: I have just received positive information that an American vessel, brig Cato, Hugh Delany master, has been boarded and robbed at Tabasco, at a place called Escovas, twelve leagues below Villa Hermosa, the principal town; the master and three men wounded. This vessel, together with another, the schooner Leader, both of Philadelphia, require protection, which I have no doubt you will promptly afford them. It is desirable, your vessel permitting it, that you proceed to Tabasco before entering this port. The masters of the aforesaid mentioned vessels are said to have landed their guns on the beach, and there formed a battery for their protection.

I am, sir, with great respect, your very humble and obedient servant,

WILLIAM TAYLOR.

Licutenant Commandant CHAS. BOARMAN, U. S. Schooner Weasel.

ANCHORAGE OFF SACRIFICIOS, October 4, 1823.

Commodore Porter, commanding the U. S. Squadron, Thompson's Island:

SIR: Forty-eight hours after sailing of the United States ship Hornet from the port of Vera Cruz, the Castle of St. John De Ulloa opened its fire on the town and forts of Vera Cruz, which has continued from the 25th of last month to this day, at intervals, always answered by the Mexican forts; the injury done on either side is very trifling, but commerce is driven down from Vera Cruz, and must resort to other points. Alvarado, a bar harbor, thirty-six miles southeast from this place, admitting vessels of eleven feet, is the point which in all probability will be most resorted to.

It is impossible to foresee the termination of these hostilities; and should the Spanish authorities of Cuba support the Governor of Ulloa in his mad attack, it is somewhat probable that a blockade of Alvarado, and of the Mexican coast generally, may be undertaken. In such an event, the property of the citizens of the United States, to a considerable amount, may be placed in imminent hazard, and will require, to relieve it from jeopardy, some interference on the part of our government and of our naval force.

Three are at present in the port of Alvarado—the schooner Fame, of Philadelphia, and a schooner from New Orleans; the brig George and the schooner Tom, both of Philadelphia, sail from this anchorage on to-morrow, for the same port; several vessels from the United States, richly laden, are daily expected, and from the interior a considerable sum is expected, belonging to citizens of the United States, and intended to be shipped for our country.

I deem it my duty to apprise you of these circumstances. Your patriotism and vigilance, I have no doubt, will promptly induce you to adopt such measures as the case may require.

With much respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

T. REILLY, Vice Consul of the U. S. for the Port of Vera Cruz.

NEW ORLEANS, April 15, 1823.

SIR: A most atrocious act of piracy has been committed in Campeachy Bay, on the American brig Belisarius, attended by the murder of her captain and cook in a most shocking and cruel manner; and calls for every effort to bring the perpetrators to punishment. It also appears from the statement of the mate, and such of the crew of the Belisarius as have been examined, that, at the time this act of piracy was committed, there were several other vessels in sight, which, from hoisting the same flag with the vessel committing the act, must be of the same character.

With the view of destroying this piratical association, bringing the guilty to punishment, and affording protection to the commerce of the United States in the Gulf of Mexico, now very valuable, I have determined to retain the United States schooner Grampus, under your command, on that service, until the pleasure of the Department shall be known.

Proceed therefore with the United States schooner Grampus to the Bay of Campeachy, in pursuit of the piratical vessel or vessels above mentioned, "looking into as many of the ports and inlets, on the Spanish coast in your route, as safety and the nature of the service will permit, with the view of discovering any piratical vessels, and to afford protection to merchant vessels of the United States." In the detention or capture of vessels, you will govern yourself by the general cruising instructions and laws for the suppression of the slave trade and punishment of piracy, furnished you by the Navy Department.

Afford convoy and protection to any merchant vessels of the United States that may be bound from this to any ports on your route, and give notice at such ports as you may touch, that you will occasionally call off those ports, and give convoy to this port, Mobile, or Pensacola, particularly at Campeachy, Tabasco, Vera Cruz and Tampico; from which ports large remittances in specie are expected here. Communicate with me by such opportunities as may offer.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

DANIEL T. PATTERSON.

To Lieut. Commandant FRANCIS H. GREGORY, U. S. Schooner Grampus, New Orleans.

[Extract.]

NEW ORLEANS, December 27, 1823.

The success that has attended your exertions, in the punishment and suppression of piracy, has surpassed the most sanguine expectations of our country, and justly called forth the best feelings towards yourself, officers and men.

The merchants here were much pleased by the arrival of the Wild Cat; and if you could spare a small vessel, to touch periodically at Alvarado, Vera Cruz, and Tampico, and thence to this port, the commerce of this port would be very materially benefited thereby. From those ports, and particularly Tampico, large sums in specie are frequently shipped to this place, and, from want of opportunities by vessels of war, they are obliged to risk it on board small merchant schooners; and could you establish a regular conveyance, by a vessel of war, the shipments would be greatly increased. Applications are frequently made to me, to know whether you would send any of your vessels to those ports, and permit them to transport specie to this place. Early part of this month, a small schooner brought up from Tampico $250,000 at once, which would have been put on board a vessel of war in preference, had one been there, the commission on which would have been 2½ per cent. A most essential service would be rendered to the merchants of this place by such an arrangement, and protection afforded to a most valuable and rapidly increasing commerce in the Bay Mexico, and, I hope, prove advantageous to yourself and officers. Any assistance I may be able to render you will be most cheerfully afforded.

(Signed) DANIEL T. PATTERSON.

Commodore DAVID PORTER, &c., &c.

NEW ORLEANS, March 18, 1824.

SIR: Captain Paillet, who has, for some time past, been engaged in the commerce between this port and Tabasco, in the province of that name, where he has a trading house established, and was captured in January last, by a piratical boat—called on me two days ago, to communicate the circumstances attending his capture, and such information as he had obtained while in their custody.

He was captured on board the American brig Harriet and Lucy, Captain Fanswart, of Hallowell, (which he had chartered,) on the 24th of January last, when close in with the entrance of the river Tabasco, by an open boat or pirogue, mounting an iron four-pounder in the bow—having a crew of sixteen athletic young men, armed with pistols and cutlasses—the crew all European Spaniards. The brig was taken possession of, but the officers and crew not materially maltreated.

The pirates represented themselves as part of a band consisting of fifty men, and, as they said, all equally strong and determined as they were, but that they were without a captain, and urged Captain Paillet to join their association and become their chief, which he resolutely refused, and demanded to be put on shore with the officers and crew of the brig, which they complied with on the following day, after plundering them of everything.

Part of the brig's cargo consisted of wines, a cask of which was, during the night, hoisted on deck, broached, and each helped themselves as they desired. The effects of the wine rendered the pirates incautious, and they conversed of their affairs without disguise, "in vino veritas." Captain Paillet, who is a native of this city, and understands the Spanish language perfectly, listened attentively to their conversation, and learned that their association, as before stated, consisted of fifty persons; that they cruised only in open boats or pirogues, never ventured far from land, and that their boats drew so little water as to be at any time beached with entire safety to their crews; their rendezvous is at the Island de Mugeres, or Mohair Key, lying off Cape Catoche, distant about five miles, to which place they take their prizes; and from thence send their goods to Merida, the capital of the province of Yucatan.

The channel or passage between the cape and island is alone used by them; the water not deep and the anchorage secure. As evidence of their security, they mentioned having captured a brig, and after cutting away her masts, moored her in this channel, where she remained upwards of two years; that they had not been molested by any cruisers, but that the Governor of Merida had once sent a party of soldiers against them, whom they had defeated.

My informant, who has been known to me several years, is highly respectable, and upon whose veracity and intelligence full reliance may be placed, thinks, from what he learnt, that deposits of property, to considerable amount, is made at Mohair Key, by these pirates; and, from his knowledge of the country, recommends, in case a force should be sent against them, that the vessels should not make the island in the day, but, if practicable, in the evening, that their approach to the island may not be discovered; then surprise them, and prevent their escape.

The commerce between this port and Tabasco, Sical and Campeachy is already very valuable, and fast increasing. Information relative to these pirates, and their movements, will be given by the Governor of Sical, where it is advisable to call, before proceeding to Mohair Key.

The boat that captured the Harriet and Lucy came out from the river St. Pedro, distant from Tabasco river only a few miles.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

DAN'L T. PATTERSON.

Com. DAVID PORTER, commanding U. S. Naval Forces in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico.

[Extract.]

NEW ORLEANS, March 31, 1824.

I had the pleasure to write you by the Wild Cat, Lieutenant Wolbert. The schooner mentioned in that letter has made several trips to Tampico, and each time brought large sums in specie, and a small schooner lately arrived from thence with upwards of a million of dollars in gold doubloons; 'tis said a large amount is ready for shipment to this place, and waiting a secure conveyance—much of it American property. The best interests of our country, it appears to me, are promoted by the introduction of such large amounts of specie. I wish you would detach a small vessel or two to me; I could find employment for them beneficial to the public service.

(Signed) DAN'L T. PATTERSON.

NEW ORLEANS, May 20, 1824.

SIR: I received, with great pleasure, your letter of the 25th ult., by Lieutenant Ritchie. The arrival of the Fox, to be employed between this place and Tampico, has given general satisfaction to the merchants of this city, and indeed to the whole community; and I shall endeavor to make it beneficial to you, at the same time that it proves so to the public. Lieutenant Ritchie leaves this place this afternoon, to join his vessel at the Balize, and will sail immediately for Tampico, should this city be, (as I much fear it will,) afflicted this summer by an epidemic. The small vessels can rendezvous at Barataria, where they can receive any supplies they may require, without delay, from the city, and without exposure to the disease of the city; they can also there obtain fresh provisions in abundance.

We have all been gratified by the visit of young Farragut, of whom we have formed a high opinion; he has given us most gratifying information of you, Mrs. Porter and your family. This will, I presume, find you preparing for your return to the United States, as Lieutenant Ritchie informs me you will probably do in the ensuing month.

Piracy is now quite down, and will want only a force in the West Indies cruising, to keep it so. I have not heard of any act of piracy, or force, since my letter to you on the subject. Should I learn of any, it shall be immediately communicated to you.

Very truly, yours, &c.,

(Signed) DAN'L T. PATTERSON.

SEA GULL, Port Rodgers, July 19, 1823.

I notice what you say relative to the agitations which prevail in Cuba, and have in consequence sent the schooner Fox to cruise off Havana, and to communicate with you every day.

If in your opinion a sloop-of-war will be necessary to take on board the specie of our merchants, and other valuable property to transport to the United States, or to this place for temporary security, please to give me the earliest intelligence, and one shall be sent.

Lieutenant Commandant Ritchie has orders to return to this place with any communication you may have to make to me.

With sentiments of respect and esteem, your obedient servant,

U. S. SHIP PEACOCK, Thompson's Island, April 5, 1823.

SIR: I have received your favor of March 28, and regret extremely my inability to comply with your wish at this moment, in keeping a stationary force off Havana, in consequence of those vessels having left the station, before my arrival, which I confidently expected to find here, and intended for regular convoy.

I have been under the necessity of employing some of my small vessels to convoy from Matanzas, and so soon as some others of them arrive, which are now to leeward of Cuba, I shall make a similar disposition with regard to Havana.

This you may rest assured of, that whatever force I may have at my disposal, I shall endeavor to employ it so as to afford the most effectual protection to our trade.

Hoping that your family have ere this arrived in safety,

I remain with great respect, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

GEORGE KNIGHT, Esq., Havana.

NUEVITAS, April 16, 1824.

SIR: Although I have not the pleasure of knowing you personally, I know well your merit and your fame.

This will be handed you by Captain Legare; he has rendered, and is rendering, services to our country, in company with his brother officers, on this unprotected coast.

As I well know your desire to be universally useful, I take the liberty to recommend to your attention this part of the island. I do firmly believe that you cannot better employ a respectable vessel of war, in any situation, than on this coast from Sugar Key to Orange Harbor. Our vessels trade considerably to this place, and frequently suffer by piratical boats.

I wish you may find it convenient to order one of your vessels of war to this place, in about twenty days, to convoy out a schooner bound for New York.

I am your obedient servant,

JOHN OWEN.

Commodore DAVID PORTER, commanding U. S. Naval Forces West Indies, Gulf of Mexico, &c.

U. S. SHIP PEACOCK, off Matanzas, March 26, 1823.

SIR: By a brig bound to Havana, I embrace the opportunity to send you an extract of a letter from the Captain General of Porto Rico to me, dated the 6th inst., in reply to certain inquiries relative to the privateers fitted out from the island, and their authority for interrupting our commerce with the main.

The information it contains is interesting to our merchants, and I beg you to give it publicity.

I am now bound into Matanzas, to wait for the boats of this ship, which, with the greater part of her crew, and some small schooners, have been near a week absent among the keys, on the south side of the old straits.

We have examined all the keys on the other side, and have thoroughly sounded the north sides of Porto Rico, St. Domingo, and Cuba, as far down as Cayo Confites. I have sent small vessels down the north sides of these islands, to examine every place where a pirate would be likely to be found, and have dispatched the Shark to scour the coast from Caraccas to La Vera Cruz. I have made the most of the force under my command, but the result of all the operations I cannot know until I arrive at Thompson's Island, where they will rendezvous.

I hope to be there in a few days, and shall soon visit Cuba again. In the meantime, I beg of you to write to me at Matanzas, and give me all the information you can about the pirates, and if at any time you get intelligence of them, which it is desirable I should have soon, it will be well to dispatch a boat to Thompson's Island with the information, the expense of which I will cheerfully pay.

I send you a letter for the captain general, which I beg you, after reading, to seal and present to him. You will perceive the necessity of a speedy reply, but I fear one cannot be had before I leave Matanzas. I shall, therefore, leave behind me a vessel to bring the answer, which you had better send under cover to one of the American merchants, (or consul or commercial agent, if there be one established there,) to deliver to the commander.

By a list furnished me from the Captain General of Porto Rico, it appears that only four privateers are commissioned to cruise from that island, one of which is taken by the patriot cruiser Constitution, two others are laid up at Mayaguada, and one was spoken by part of my squadron on the south side of Porto Rico.

There is one privateer from Porto Cabello called the Esperanza, which sailed from St. Johns on the 20th January last.

I spoke a British squadron off St. Thomas, which afterwards went to St. Johns, consisting of a frigate and two sloops of war, being part of the force under Commodore Owen, and bound to the leeward station.

I also found two British sloops-of-war at Cayo Confites, searching for pirates. They had been on that service five weeks, and taken nothing. They informed me that they had burnt a house and flag staff at Key Encenachos, therefore if we should be charged with the act I beg you set the matter right.

At St. Johns an extremely melancholy occurrence took place, by the firing of the batteries on one of my small schooners, which resulted in the death of her commander, Lieutenant Commanding William C. Cocke.

The affair will occasion great excitement in the United States, and cannot be justified on any principle. The captain general has endeavored to atone for it by his regrets, but nothing short of the punishment of the officer who gave the order to fire on my squadron, will or ought to satisfy the government and people of the United States.

We enjoy unusually good health in our squadron, and I feel disposed to preserve it by avoiding Havana, which is the reason of my not visiting it now.

Have the goodness to let me know where our vessels on this station are, and all you know about them.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, your most obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

JOHN WARNER, Esq., American Consul, Havana.

U. S. SHIP PEACOCK, Thompson's Island, April 5, 1823.

SIR: By a small expedition under Captain Cassin, I send you this, and it is likely you will often hear from me in this way hereafter. If any vessels arrive, another will leave here in a few days, and I hope hereafter, when I get organized, to afford regular convoy from Havana every Saturday morning, as I now do from Matanzas every Sunday.

I have not much more than half the force that I calculated on, in consequence of the vessels having unexpectedly left the coast of Cuba before my arrival. I shall do all I can with whatever force I may have, and I think I shall be able to give our trade effectual protection, and at the same time keep the pirates on the look out.

I have not yet received the letters I understood were sent to Matanzas.

With great respect, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

JOHN WARNER, Esq., American Consul, Havana.

[Extract.]

U. S. SHIP PEACOCK, Allenton, April 10, 1823.

SIR: This will be handed to you by Lieut. Com. L. Kearney, of the Grayhound, who, with four schooners, is charged by me with the protection of our commerce at Havana and Matanzas.

He will give convoy from Havana every Saturday, and convoy will be given from Matanzas every Sunday. It will, however, be necessary to clean the vessels soon, as we have had no opportunity of doing anything to them since they left the United States. You will be informed when this is to be done, in order that the merchants may make their arrangements accordingly.

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Directed to JOHN WARNER, Esq., American Consul, Havana.

SEA GULL, Allenton, June 7, 1823.

SIR: On the 1st and 15th of every month one of the armed vessels under my command will leave Havana for the United States, with convoy, and her letter bag will be left at the counting-house of Messrs. Castillo, Black & Co.

Will you have the goodness to apprise the merchants of this arrangement, that they may avail themselves of the opportunities?

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. PORTER.

JNO. MOUNTAIN, Esq., Consular Office.

MATANZAS, March 29, 1823.

SIR: We, the undersigned, representing the commercial interest of the United States at this port, beg leave respectfully to greet you on your arrival among us.

The pleasure which, as Americans, in a foreign land, we should always experience in seeing the national flag of our country waving over the head of one of her most esteemed commanders, is in this case sensibly increased by the state of almost total abandonment in which we were left previous to your arrival—and the confidence which your character inspires, in constant and complete protection in future to our suffering commerce in this quarter. From the commencement of piratical depredations in these seas, the immediate vicinity of this place seems to have been a favorite scene for their operations. The numerous, secure, and intricate harbors above and below this place, to which they carry their prizes and plunder, the absence of any Spanish naval force, at the disposal of the governor of this place, and the very unfrequent appearance of vessels of war of any nation in this harbor, have emboldened the buccaneers to acts of audacious villany, which would scarce be credited by persons not near the scene of their perpetration, and accustomed to a different state of society. Vessels of the most contemptible force, and even open boats, have made captures, almost in the mouth of the harbor, in as fearless a manner as if their pursuits were lawful and proper; and with a knowledge of the actual existence of a force of this kind blockading the port, we have been without the smallest means of relief, and vessels have waited from ten to twenty days for convoy, and finding no prospect of obtaining any, have collected in large fleets and braved the danger—some have escaped, some been fortunate enough to repel their assailants, and some have been captured.

A day or two after an attack on the brigs Neptune, Bondoni, and Abeona, in which the pirates were repulsed, but remained still in the neighborhood, information was communicated to Captain Biddle, of the Macedonian, who, with the United States brig Spark, was then at Havana, and convoy solicited for seven vessels then here; but no answer was received, and after waiting many days they started without one. It is now but little less than five months since the blood of Allen stained the waves of Seguapa—since the foe was left in possession of that bay, and we believe that to this hour it is infested by these desperadoes; but the immense amount of property for which it has been the receptacle is notorious and acknowledged; yet in all the period we have named, we are ignorant of its having been explored by any armed force, or of any attempt having been made to ferret out the pirates from this their principal retreat; nor has convoy been afforded except on two occasions during that time. We are well aware that the limited extent of the American trade to this port, where only about two hundred and twenty vessels enter and clear annually, may not justify a large force for its protection; but when we reflect that in protecting it you cover also the commerce to Havana, Pensacola, and New Orleans, as is proved by the fact that four out of five of the vessels recaptured by the Alligator were bound to the two latter ports, and were captured very near here; and that a very small force is amply sufficient for the purpose; we are well assured you will grant it, and agree with us, two or three schooners cannot be better employed than in guarding so important a thoroughfare. We conceive that two small and one large schooner would be sufficient to afford weekly convoy from hence, which would be as often as necessary; and in convoying vessels outward bound from hence, those coming from the United States would also derive the benefit of it. At this particular conjuncture we beg to state that there are in port many vessels which will be ready for sea from the middle to the end of the coming week, and respectfully request that the schooners now about to proceed with the fleet may return as soon as convenient, to take the above-mentioned vessels under their protection, and continue to give convoy until it may suit your arrangements to send other vessels.

We are the more inclined to urge this request from the belief that the moment your vessels are out of sight depredations will be recommenced with increased activity and ferocity, as the numbers of the pirates have not been in any manner diminished. Leaving the subsequent arrangements for our protection entirely to your judgment and experience, we would add that, without any diminution of attachment to our native land, we feel a lively interest in the prosperity of Cuba, and the promotion and extension of its intercourse with the United States, which is highly beneficial to both; and to express our confidence that, through your judicious management and exertions, while the lawless, abandoned, and cruel desperadoes who infest the coast meet with prompt and exemplary chastisement, the relation of amity and good will which exists between the government and better orders of the people and the United States will be cherished and strengthened.

Appreciating, in the warmest manner, the motives which prompted yourself and the gallant officers of your squadron to volunteer in this service, where no laurel blooms on the brow of danger to tempt the eager aspirant to pluck it—and where humanity and patriotism could alone have supplied the place of the more usual, but less noble excitement of desire of wealth and glory—and wishing you and them every possible success, and the most ample and acceptable reward,

We have the honor to be, sir, your most humble servants,

LATTING, ADAMS & STEWART.

To Com. D. PORTER, commanding U. S. Naval Forces in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico.

U. S. SHIP PEACOCK, Matanzas, March 30, 1823.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your representation, in behalf of the American merchants of Matanzas, of the unprotected state of the commerce of this place, and asking for convoy for the same.

It is the source of great regret to me that my means of affording convoy should be so circumscribed as they are, having now no vessels on the station but those intended for the pursuit and destruction of the pirates, and are illy adapted for the purposes of convoy. You may rest assured, however, that every effort shall be made, not only to afford convoy, but to effect the other objects of my visit to these seas, and it remains for us only to redouble our exertions to make up for part of the force which will be diverted from the object for which it was originally intended.

I shall, for the present, have two small schooners, the Wild Cat and the Beagle, to give convoy every Sunday morning, as far as the Double Headed Shot Keys; and when it shall be in my power to afford better protection, it shall be done.

For the flattering expression of your sentiments towards me, and the officers under my command, be pleased to accept my sincere thanks.

Believe me to be, gentlemen, your very obedient, humble servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

To Messrs. Latting, Adams & Stewart; Atkins & Allen; Simpson, Tryon & Co., Matanzas.

Matanzas, Sept. 17, 1823.

To Lieut. Commandant F. H. Gregory, U. S. Schooner Grampus:

Sir: Understanding that you are about to leave this station, we, the undersigned, beg leave to assure [you] of the high sense we entertain of the means you have adopted to protect our trade, of which we have received repeated benefits: at the same time, we feel it our duty to express our thanks to you for your promptitude in furnishing convoy, and assisting single vessels out of that bay, in furnishing boats to tow them out, when otherwise dangerous delays would have occurred in their getting to sea.

We also deem it necessary that the Navy Department should be made more fully acquainted with the forces which are necessary to guard against any future attempt to establish piratical hordes in this vicinity. This has been fully exemplified by the measures which you have adopted, of remaining in port with the U. S. schooner Grampus, and keeping out small launches to scour the coast; the result of which has completed every expectation, and cannot fail of being highly gratifying to Commodore Porter. We have no doubt that the salubrity of this port is well known to the Navy Department, and confidently hope that your success will induce them to adopt the same as a standing measure, while the necessity of this protection continues.

We should feel highly gratified, could we entertain the hope of your returning amongst us, and avail of this opportunity to assure you of our personal esteem.

We remain, sir, your obedient servants,

LATTING, ADAMS & STEWART.

Bank of the United States, November 20, 1823.

Dear Sir: I have been for some time desirous of communicating with you, previous to Commodore Porter's sailing, on the subject of employing some part of the West India squadron in protecting the trade between the United States and Mexico. There is now in that country, according to the best information I can procure, property to the amount of about one million and a half dollars, belonging to New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, with a prospect of an increase of business. Besides incurring the risk of piracy, this property is subjected to great hazard in the ports of Mexico itself, during its convulsions, and this danger will be much increased, should there be an effort on the part of Spain, to reconquer the country, by sending an army there. In such an event, property which, on board of merchant ships, might be seized and confiscated, would be perfectly safe in a national vessel. It would therefore be highly useful to our commerce, and very acceptable to the merchants, if you could arrange the movements of the West India squadron in such a manner as always to keep one of the public vessels at Vera Cruz, or Alvarado, until she was relieved by another; thus enabling our countrymen to secure their property while it remained in Mexico, and afterwards obtain the benefit of convoy. The presence of such a vessel would, besides its direct protection of American property, occasion a considerable transmission, to the United States, of specie, which now finds its way to Europe, by other channels. There is another matter connected with it which deserves reflection. The exports of Mexico are almost exclusively specie and cochineal. Now cochineal is nearly as valuable, in proportion to its bulk, as specie; it occupies comparatively very little space, and is as good, if not a better remittance, owing to its high price in Europe. If our ships were allowed to receive this article as well as specie, it would be of great importance; and the indulgence might, perhaps, be fairly allowed, under the peculiar circumstances of our trade with Mexico.

This subject has excited considerable interest, and there is a disposition to present a memorial to the government; but on your account I should prefer, in case you approve the measure, that it come spontaneously from yourself.

The interest which the Bank of the United States has, in common with the country at large, in giving every facility to the introduction of a sound currency, will explain, and I trust excuse, the freedom with which I venture to submit these remarks for your consideration.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, yours,

N. BIDDLE, President.

Hon. Samuel L. Southard, Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

NEW YORK, August 13, 1824.

MY DEAR SIR: Your esteemed favor of the 10th reached me this morning, and I shall ascertain to-day if the Spark will be in time for my purposes. I can assure you that my regret at the publication of the Matanzas petition was quite equal to your own; but my indignation was excited by the official or ostensibly official communication which accompanied it. The act of the clerk in the counting, was without a shadow of authority, and contrary to my orders; I immediately notified the editors of the paper of that fact; and seeing reference again made to it, in a wretched compound of folly and falsehood, published in the democratic press, I yesterday addressed a few lines to the editors of the American, which you will see in that paper of to-day. 'Tis wonderful that editors of papers should become dupes of such miserable retailers of lies as the writer of "the spy"—"pero no hay remedio."

I shall be infinitely glad to see you here; I am at 16 Broadway, but will not fail to look out for you.

And am, with the utmost sincerity, dear sir, your most obedient servant,

F. ADAMS.

MATANZAS, December 18, 1824.

MY DEAR SIR: I learn with much satisfaction, from your favor of the 15th instant, your arrival in our neighborhood, and shall anticipate the pleasure of a visit from you here at as early a period as your arrangements will permit. On the subject of piracies, as much is known, and much more said, in the United States than here. In the early part of summer, the John, of Newport, and Castor, of Portland, were captured near, and bound here; the former arrived here with some trifling loss of property, and the [latter] at Havana. No lives were lost in either case. The Mercator was said to be captured between this and Havana, from New York, bound to that place. No subsequent tidings have been received of her, and a passenger, a Spaniard, who escaped, appears to be the authority on which the capture was reported. The transaction at Bahia Honda comes next in order of date, and, beyond the recapture made by the Icaras, Capt. Graham, I have seen no evidence whatever of there having been other captures recently made there. I expect soon to see Capt. Graham, with whom I am acquainted, and shall procure from him correct information on the subject. The last instance of piracy of which we have any accounts, was the capture of the Laura Ann, of New York, near Cannise, a few leagues to leeward of this port, surpassing in atrocity anything I have known before. The Hornet had been some days in Havana; the Porpoise was there also, but just arrived from Africa; the Ferret had left there but a day or two before, when this vessel was taken, about the 21st October. Capt. Skinner arrived here about the 23d, and, without particular duty to act on, sent secretly an expedition of boats to Seguapa; on their return they encountered and captured the piratical schooner Ann, the clothes of Capt. Shaw, and much other plunder, which were brought in here. After Capt. S. had sailed, a sailor, in a wretched condition, was brought to me, who detailed the capture of the Laura Ann, the murder of the captain and crew, himself excepted, and his escape. The Ferret arriving next day, he was put on board, and Escondio, Cannise, and the adjacent coast searched by Capt. Bell. The long boat, and some half burnt spars and sails were found, and a man, recognized by the sailor, who was seized, brought here, and delivered to the authorities, where the business seems to have ended. The unceasing vigilance which has since been exerted by the different vessels, with their boats, along the whole coast, seems to render an act of piracy almost an impossibility at present. Some vessel-of-war is always here, and convoy given whenever desired, and boats almost always outside, above and below us. I am aware that censure has been cast on you, on account of recent depredations of the pirates; but those who know the advantages they have in changing their position, and assailing vessels passing down the coast, in despite of the vicinity of men-of-war, the facts I have stated with regard to the Laura Ann, prove that nothing short of a string of vessels round the island, in hail of each other, can prevent the plunder of altogether unarmed vessels. A very small armament would suffice for defence against small boats, and our naval force is sufficient protection against those of larger class. The Laura Ann had no arms—shame to her owners. The licensed pirates, or vessels armed, manned, and commanded by citizens of the United States, such as the Eagle, Polly Hampton, Columbian, &c., are only less annoying to an honest commerce than the murderers of Shaw.

We are now near two weeks without an arrival from the middle States, and have consequently few or no papers. I send all I can lay my hands on. It appears quite probable that the hero of New Orleans will be made President of the United States by the people; to us who have not been on the spot to observe any of the operations of electioneering, this sudden reeving round of the breeze of popular favor seems incomprehensible.

I shall attend to your little commission, and am, my dear sir, with the highest regard and esteem,

Your most obedient servant,

F. ADAMS.

SEA GULL, Allenton, June 7, 1823.

SIR: In consequence of the necessity for looking out for pirates on the south side, and the consequent dispersion of my forces, I shall not at present be able to give convoy so regular as I have done, but still I shall give it often and regular enough to protect our commerce. When some of the large vessels arrive that I daily expect, convoy shall be established as usual.

I give this information to prevent any disappointment on the part of the merchants and others, and I beg you to assure them their interests shall not be neglected.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

U. S. Ship John Adams, Thompson's Island, December 15, 1824.

My Dear Sir: I arrived here a few days since, and should have been over to see you, but for the daily expectation of two vessels from the United States, which will require, on their arrival, my immediate attention, after which I shall be under the necessity of going to Pensacola and Tampa Bay. I shall be with you about the middle of next month, and hope to find you in the enjoyment of health.

As there have been various and alarming accounts of piracies committed since last June, I will thank you to give me a statement of the captures known to have been made. It has been stated that the British discovered near Bahia Honda the wrecks of twelve vessels lately destroyed. Do you know anything of that affair? Are not those the wrecks of twelve sail of English vessels which were cut off a convoy about six or eight months before I first came to suppress piracy?

It is very desirable to get correct information on this subject, as the account is generally believed, and has brought great censure on me and others.

Please to send me papers of any date since I left the United States, for we are entirely out of news for upwards of six weeks.

With sincere respect, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Trinidad de Cuba, January 26, 1823.

David Porter, Esq., Commodore of the American squadron on the coast of Cuba, &c.:

Sir: Feeling it a duty I owe to my countrymen engaged in trade to this side of the island, to address you on the subject of their protection, I take that liberty, knowing that all the aid in your power, you will cheerfully grant. This port has, for some time past, been infested with a small force of pirates, who have captured a number of vessels; and on the 20th instant, the brig Mechanic, of New York, bound in. They now hold the captain and two passengers as hostages for the ransom of that vessel, in the sum of $3,000, and have declared that unless the money is immediately sent to them, the hostages shall be put to death. Preparation is making to forward the amount, as there are no other means to rescue these unfortunate men. Their force will no doubt increase in proportion to their success, and the facility with which they have gained the amount of the ransom for the brig Mechanic, will induce a number of ill-disposed idlers to join them. Several valuable vessels are daily expected from Europe, and if no force is used to extirpate them, the loss of property will be considerable.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

ROBERT R. STEWART.

P. S.—The hostages have just arrived, and say that the pirates have received the $3,000.

To the commander of the naval forces of the United States, stationed at or in the vicinity of Havana, Island of Cuba:

The undersigned, citizens of the United States, resident merchants and shipmasters in Trinidad de Cuba, respectfully represent, that this port is at present infested by a horde of pirates, who rendezvous among the numerous keys in the immediate vicinity; that the brig Mechanic, of New York, was captured on the 20th instant, by twelve of these wretches, in an open boat, within two leagues of the harbor; that, after plundering the vessel, and robbing the crew of their bedding and clothing, they abandoned the brig, detained the captain, second mate and cooper, demanding a ransom of $3,000—threatening them with death unless the ransom should be sent immediately after the arrival of the vessel in port; that a brig and schooner are now in the offing, both of which must fall a prey to the marauders; that there are no means in our power of affording them any assistance; that there are at present in port ten American vessels, and nearly that number daily expected, with valuable cargoes. We therefore beg leave to solicit your attention to the exposed situation of the American commerce, in this quarter, and pray that your aid and assistance may be extended for its protection. We have no doubt that the appearance of a single armed vessel would suppress these depredations.

U. S. Galliot Sea Gull, Matanzas, April 16, 1823.

Gentlemen: I received your application for convoy yesterday, and had previously sent two schooners and two barges to the vicinity of Trinidada.

The whole number of men present under my command, do not amount to the number on board one of our large frigates; and with this force I have endeavored to give convoy to merchant vessels from this place and Havana, and at the same time pursue the pirates; consequently, I have not been able to give a convoy to those on the south side of the island.

The weakness of my force arises from the circumstance of some of our larger vessels of war, which I expected to have found here, having left these seas; but why they have done so is unknown to me. Hereafter, I hope to be possessed of better means, and to have it in my power to gratify your wishes at an early period.

I have the honor to be, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, Thompson's Island, December 15, 1824.

As there have been various reports of captures by pirates, some no doubt greatly exaggerated, will you give me, as nearly as you can, an account of all captures known positively to have been made, both for my own satisfaction, and the satisfaction of the government?

As these accounts have brought censure on me and others concerned in the suppression of piracy—are not the twelve wrecks of vessels discovered by the British to leeward of Bahia Honda, the same that were cut out of an English convoy about six or eight months before I first came out to take command?

It is very desirable that correct information be had on this subject.

With sincere esteem, your obedient servant,

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, Thompson's Island, January 15, 1825.

SIR: I have received your letter of this date, applying for convoy for the schooner Leo, of which you are supercargo, to the port of Alvarado; and I regret to inform you that it is not in my power to give the convoy required.

We have now in the neighborhood of Alvarado, for the protection of our commerce in the Gulf of Mexico, two schooners, and the present scattered state of the squadron under my command prevents my sending any more to that quarter.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

MISCELLANEOUS ORDERS TO, AND CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN, DIFFERENT OFFICERS.

U. S. STEAM GALLIOT SEA GULL, May 4, 1824.

SIR: I have sent home the ship Decoy for stores, and the schooner Grayhound for repairs and to be coppered.

The enclosed list will inform you of our wants, which I will thank you to cause to be supplied with all possible dispatch, in order that the ship may return to the station, where the stores are much required. I will thank you, also, to cause the Grayhound to be furnished with two chain cables, and to dispatch her as soon as possible

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Captain S. EVANS, New York.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, Thompson's Island, January 28, 1825.

SIR: Having received orders from the Hon. Secretary of Navy to repair to Washington, and on my leaving the station to deliver the command to you, with all such papers, instructions, and information as may be useful to enable you in the most effectual manner to accomplish all the objects for which the vessels under my command were placed here, I have now the honor to send you the general order book of the station, which details the general duties of officers.

Those orders of a more particular character are now in the hands of the clerks, and copies will be furnished as soon as they can be made out, with such other information as may be useful to you.

During my continuance here, I shall be happy to inform you, from time to time, on all subjects connected with the duties to be performed, and of those which are now in progress.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient,

D. PORTER.

Captain L. WARRINGTON, U. S. Navy.

U. S. Ship John Adams, Thompson's Island, January 29, 1825.

Sir: The only orders from the Navy Department which remain unexecuted are those, copies of which I now enclose you. You will find in possession of the commanding officer of the island orders and instructions on every point of duty important to be informed of. It therefore only remains for me to give a brief sketch of the disposition of the squadron under my command at this time, to wit:

Captain Dallas, at Thompson's Island, corvette John Adams, bearing my pendant, and destined for the United States; sloop-of-war Hornet, Kennedy, ordered to cruise on the south side of Cuba, for three months from the 22d December, 1824, between Cape Cruz and Cape Antonio; brig Spark, Newton, at New York, repairing; schooner Shark, Gallagher, under orders to proceed to St. Thomas, and to return to this place; schooner Grampus, Sloat, and schooner Beagle, Platt, ordered to cruise about St. Thomas, Porto Rico, and occasionally to run over to the main; the Beagle, ordered to the United States; schooner Porpoise, Skinner, ordered to the Gulf of Mexico, and after cruising six weeks there, to proceed to Havana, and thence to the United States, should she have on board $100,000 to be landed there, otherwise she is to repair to this place; her orders are dated ———; Sea Gull, steam galliot, M'Keever; schooner Terrier, Payne; schooner Ferret, Bell; barge Musquito, at Matanzas, for the protection of our commerce in that neighborhood, and in the old Straits of Bahama; schooner Weasel, Boarman, on her way to the United States, specie, considerably out of repair, and will probably be sold; schooner Fox, Cook, expected daily with a party for the survey of Pensacola and Tampa Bay; barges Diabolita and Gallinipper, on a cruise among the Colorados, expected in a few days; store ship Decoy, Mix, expected daily from New York with stores; three barges under the shed, neither of them sufficiently strong to cross the gulf.

Should any information suggest itself to me as necessary for you, or should you think of anything necessary for me to inform you of, it will afford me pleasure to furnish it.

With great respect, your obedient,

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Captain L. Warrington.

[Extract from letter.]

Baltimore, December 21, 1822.

Steamboat and small vessels will each carry six weeks' provisions and stores, and that the store ship will carry a supply for six months, which quantities you will please to provide.

(Signed) D. PORTER.

Directed to F. A. Thornton, Esq., Purser.

Washington, July 19, 1824.

My Dear Sir: On calling at the Navy Office to-day, I received the enclosed copy of a petition from Matanzas; by this time the Terrier must have completed her service on the coast of Florida, and is present in the absence of the Ferret, to afford the protection asked for; but in the event of its being otherwise, the Wild Cat will arrive in good season.

Lieutenant Zantzinger arrived to-day. He is desirous of relinquishing command; I will indulge him with leave of absence, and direct Lieutenant Boarman to supersede him and proceed to sea.

I learn from Lieutenant Zantzinger that the Ferret had gone to New Providence, and of course may be expected home.

The New York papers report the arrival of the Grampus, but give no particular details of her cruise since she left us; a letter received by the Secretary from Lieutenant Sloat refers to you for particulars.

Lieutenant Newton states to the Department that the Spark requires coppering, and that the gun slides ought to be surveyed; as the Secretary appears to be particularly anxious to keep the vessels at sea, I should hope that the contemplated repairs are not of such magnitude but that they may be deferred until the fall, and, as she is in quarantine, an additional delay will attend effecting her outfits. If her condition will authorize it, would it not be well to order her to provision and proceed from quarantine on a shorter cruise than may originally have been contemplated by you?

With respect, I am your obedient servant,

W. B. FINCH.

Commodore D. Porter, commanding, &c., &c.

Washington, July 20, 1824.

My Dear Sir: I transmit to you advices from the island, received to-day by Lieutenant Oellers, who left the Ferret off Indian Head. She will get up to the yard, I expect, in the course of the afternoon, and I will put in train any repairs she may want.

I am pleased with the general tenor of the reports, and have apprised the Secretary of it; and, for his more ready information, will condense the subject into one view.

A letter has been received to-day from Lieutenant Gallagher, advising the Secretary that the Shark is moved to the North river, and, of course, ready for sea. On reference to Mr. Barron, I learn that no sailing orders appear to have been prepared for her.

The Decoy is reported ready, waiting only for a surgeon. Doctor Ticknor has been ordered, and there is no doubt that he has by this time joined the ship. In the event of his not having done so, I shall order Doctor Morgan, who you will see has reported for duty.

In anticipation that you will give sailing orders to the Spark, Shark and Grampus, I shall write by this day's mail to their respective commanders, so that they may be ready the more promptly to obey them; or, if it please you, I will renew the orders under which they have heretofore been acting. I make this suggestion, as it is possible you may have special views for one or all of them.

Since writing the preceding paragraph, I have received Lieut. Sloat's report, now transmitted. The three bodies found about the Tortugas are those of three marines who deserted from the island.

A duplicate of Lieut. Gallagher's report of the Shark, is transmitted.

I have been constrained to trouble you with bulky communications, as the subjects and views of the writers are various, and such as I cannot in all respects act upon. If your health will not admit of giving replies in detail, a mere memorandum from you will enable me to do it. During your absence you will necessarily be more at ease, having all transactions connected with your command exhibited to your own inspection, in the language of those having in possession, and acting under orders immediately emanating from yourself.

With respect, I am your obedient servant, W. B. FINCH.

Commodore D. PORTER, commanding, &c., &c.

P. S.—The report from McIntosh, of the piracy and murder off Escondido, is really alarming. As some doubt may exist in reference to it, I have not thought it necessary to state it to the Secretary.

WASHINGTON, July 20, 1824.

SIR: I beg leave, for your information, to state that by the arrival at this place yesterday of the schooner Ferret, from Thompson's Island, via Nassau, N. P., advices are received to the 2d instant, which describe the health of that place to be unusually good: the sick report accompanies this. All the improvements directed by the commander-in-chief, as regards buildings for public purposes and individual comfort, are progressing in the order contemplated, and their completion to the extent intended may very early be realized. Plants of various kinds have been introduced from Cuba, and are in a thriving condition. The canals have been deepened so as to admit the sea water into the lagoons, near the seat of population: wild grass in that neighborhood has been destroyed, and the beach cleansed of the drift seaweed which lodges along it subject to decomposition; so that all due care seems to be taken to guard against the recurrence of the malady, similar to that which visited it last year. The season has been dry, the winds refreshing and variable, and the range of the thermometer from 95 to 98 degrees.

Acting Lieut. Farragut, commanding the Ferret, reports that while at Nassau, about the 10th instant, one of his crew, of the name of James Fredenburg, stated himself to be a deserter from H. B. Majesty's ship Pandorn; and that, in consequence, he gave him over to Captain Du Maigue, commanding H. B. Majesty's ship Kangaroo. The grounds on which Lieut. Farragut acted are, that it was repugnant to our regulations to have a foreigner in our service, and as a requital for a similar act of courtesy on the part of Capt. Du Maigue, who had not long before returned to the Wild Cat, Lieut. Legare, a deserter from one of the West India squadron. As Lieut. Farragut has been governed in this transaction by a regard to reciprocity, and not constrained thereto by any act of the British officer, I indulge the expectation that you will approve of his proceedings.

Lieut. Commandant McIntosh, under date of the 2d instant, gives a detailed report of his cruise in the Terrier, along the coast of East Florida, from Cape Sable to Carlos harbor, in search of a reported smuggling or piratical establishment, not known to us before precisely; but which he has discovered to be situated on a key called Punta Rosa, bearing N. by W. $\frac{1}{2}$ W. from the S. E. end of Sanybe Island. The number of inhabitants, Spaniards, are not ascertained with precision, but cannot be many, as there are but five thatched houses on the key, which is under the culture of corn, pompions and melons. They are occupied in fishing principally, and have licenses from Cuba to trade therewith. They rely upon the protection of our troops at Tampa Bay, regard themselves as belonging to the territory, and feel secure in their avocation. Lest, however, they might become lawless, Lieut. McIntosh removed to Thompson's Island two small carriage guns, which were alleged to have been kept to intimidate the Indians, who had committed some outrages on them. The place is now so particularly identified that occasional visits from the revenue cutter will effectually guard against the illicit introduction of goods, &c., into Florida.

Lieut. Sloat, commanding the Grampus, reports, under date of the 17th instant, from New York, that between the dates of the 4th and 27th he had visited the ports of Campeachy, Alvarado, and Tampico, in accordance with orders; that rumors prevailed of a piratical vessel being near Campeachy, for which he made diligent search fruitlessly. The schooner Jackal was at Tampico, about the 20th, and the John Adams near Vera Cruz on the 21st; so that you will perceive all the protection is afforded in the Bay of Mexico contemplated in your letter of the 20th instant.

Lieut. McIntosh, who superseded Lieut. Oellers in command at Thompson's Island, writes, under date of the 4th of July, that an American brig was stated to have been captured by a piratical boat near Matanzas, and carried into port Escondido; that he had an accurate description of the boat, and had dispatched a barge, together with the Terrier, to effect her rescue. I am encouraged to hope that his efforts may meet with success.

In addition to the protection already afforded to the commerce of Matanzas, you may calculate on the services of the Wild Cat, which sailed on Saturday last; so that this demand on the Department is answered.

The force at present in the Bay of Mexico, it is hoped, will succeed in taking or driving away the marauders stated by the paper to infest it. The almost simultaneous return of several vessels of the West India squadron to the United States it is desirable to guard against; and their cruises have been arranged with the view to that object, and the keeping of a sufficient force at all times about Cuba, and in the Bay of Mexico.

On the 15th of July, the schooner Fox had sailed from Tampico for New Orleans, so that at every practicable point some of our vessels are seen.

I cannot but congratulate you on the general good health enjoyed by the respective crews; some symptoms of fever have manifested themselves, and some deaths have occurred; this must be expected.

Exemption from disease cannot be calculated upon, though I am convinced, by reports from the respective officers, that every regard is paid to health, cleanliness and comfort.

With respect, I have the honor to be (Signed) W. B. FINCH, Captain of the Squadron.

DEAR SIR: Captain Finch desired me to enclose to you the above copy of a letter which was handed in to the Secretary of the Navy this morning. It was Captain Finch's intention to have placed it within the other enclosures which were directed and sent to you this day, but the want of time prevented him from doing so.

I had the pleasure of seeing Mrs. P. to-day, who informed me that herself and the other members of your family were all well.

With the utmost respect, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

T. BARRON.

Commodore D. PORTER.

WASHINGTON, August 9, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to report the present state of the vessels of your squadron, now in port, to be as follows:

The John Adams, at Philadelphia, requires that her rudder should be unshipped for examination about the pintles and gudgeons, and may need other overhauling. The period of service of fifty of her crew has expired, who have applied for their discharge.

The Grampus, at New York, is in readiness for sea.

The Spark, in quarantine at New York, will want repairs and officers.

The Beagle, also in quarantine at New York, will want a commander and some overhauling.

The Sea Gull is ready for service.

The Ferret, ready for service, requires a commander and some men, the latter to be furnished from the Jackal.

The Jackal, at Washington, requires considerable repairs and outfits; the Department has decided to sell her.

Orders have been issued by the Department to Lieutenants Mix and Platt to report for service, and also to several midshipmen, to supply vacancies.

The Hornet, Decoy, Shark, Wild Cat and Weasel, have recently sailed on their respective cruises.

Lieutenants Dale and Bell are applicants for commands.

With respect, I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

W. B. FINCH, Captain of Squadron.

Commodore D. PORTER, Commander-in-Chief, etc., etc.

WASHINGTON, September 16, 1824.

MY DEAR SIR: By letters received from New York, within a day or two, I find that nothing is yet doing with the Spark and Beagle, as they are not expected to be released from quarantine and admitted to the Navy yard for some time. Lieutenant Platt has before this assumed command of the latter vessel. I have addressed a written request to the Department, that the necessary instructions may be given to the commandant of the yard for their re-equipment as soon as the present restrictions are rescinded.

Orders were yesterday issued for the shipping of a crew for the Constellation, and I suggested to Commodore Rodgers and Mr. Hay the propriety of your being officially informed that she is intended for your command. Neither of them, however, can do it, though the commodore says such is the fact, and that I might so assure you; however, on this assurance, I am aware that you will feel a delicacy in expressing to the officer commanding at New York any wishes as to the style and character of her equipment. In the course of a week or ten days the Secretary will be here, when I suppose you will by him be advised of the appointment of the Constellation as the flag of your squadron. As the crew will be rapidly enlisted, probably it would be well that Mr. Thornton should be early ordered, that he may have the more time to arrange his books, etc., and be present at New York as the recruits may arrive. I have already received four applications for acting lieutenants to join the frigate.

McKeever's vessel is quite ready, with the exception of a medical officer. Hay says that I shall have one for her. McKeever some time ago expressed to me a sense of favor by being ordered to the command of the Gull, but at the same time signified that it would be preferable to him to be in some situation nearer your person; for instance, flag lieutenant, or any other designation you might give to him. He is an intelligent, efficient, and genteel officer, and I think you might find him, in a variety of ways, useful to you, if immediately under you eye and within reach.

Accounts from Norfolk state that Captain Sinclair's life is despaired of, in consequence of another paralytic stroke, and poor Farragut's wife in a critical state from a violent bilious attack.

I shall wish to leave the city for some days about the 22d inst. There is but little business claiming my attention, and you may arrive by that time.

Commodore Rodgers seems still disposed to get rid of the Jackal. I explained the cause of her being yet at this yard.

Your friends here are quite anxious about your health. I am daily asked if you get better, and am mortified in having to say that I have not heard from you since you represented your case as a source of considerable uneasiness to yourself.

The city is excessively dull, but very healthy. I hope that your family are generally well: please offer my respects.

With great regard, your obliged servant,

W. B. FINCH.

P. S.—I should like to relieve Midshipmen Smith and Browning of the Sea Gull, and attach them to the Adams, for greater improvement, their places to be supplied by two strangers, who have reported; but Dallas says he does not want more than he already has. I suppose Rapalje will go out with him as acting surgeon. I wish, also, to detach young Brent, and, with your permission, to put him in the frigate. The only objection to him is, a want of self-confidence; as he grows older, that will follow. I'll however write to Dallas.

U. S. Brig Porpoise, off Havana, December 7, 1823.

Sir: You are hereby directed to sail from Havana on Sunday morning next, the 8th inst., with such vessels as may require your convoy, and afford them protection as far as the Double Headed Shot Keys; you will then proceed to New York with the specie you may have on board belonging to American merchants, and report your arrival there to the Hon. Secretary of the Navy.

I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES RAMAGE.

Lieutenant Commandant John P. Zantzinger, U. S. Schooner Weasel.

Allenton, Thompson's Island, February 20, 1824.

Sir: You will proceed with the United States schooner Fox under your command to cruise from the Colorados to Havana, and to such other places on the north side of Cuba as may be deemed necessary, from the information you may receive, to afford the best protection to commerce and suppress piracy.

You will be governed by the "general instructions" from Commodore Porter; and when supplies of any kind are required, you will return here for them.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. WILKINSON.

Lieutenant Commandant John T. Ritchie, U. S. Schooner Fox.

U. S. Brig Spark, Sacrificios, April 30, 1824.

Sir: You will proceed, without delay, with the United States schooner Weasel, to Tampico, and there give protection to our commerce. Should there be any specie destined for the United States or the Havana, the property of American citizens, you will receive on board such sums as may be presented. The premium for specie to Havana, you will take as your guide the British rule, which does not exceed one and half per cent.; treasures for the United States command two per cent. As soon as you have received on board such sums as may be offered, you will as speedily as possible rejoin me at this place.

I am, with great respect and esteem, yours, &c.,

JOHN T. NEWTON.

Captain John P. Zantzinger, U. S. Navy.

U. S. Barge Gnat, Matanzas, September 4, 1823.

Sir: I have the honor to inform you that, in obedience to your orders of the 19th July, I left the Grampus, in company with the cutter under Mr. Sanderson. In the prosecution of those orders, I have examined the different keys, bays, inlets, rivers, and harbors of Cuba, both inside and outside, the main keys, as far to windward as Guanaha, and with regret am compelled to state that I have been unsuccessful in the capture of any pirates. On the 6th of August I was joined by the Midge, Lieutenant Platt, at Sagua la Grande, and the next day was compelled to leave that officer and three seamen, with the cutter, at Cayo Christo, in consequence of sickness, and to transfer Mr. Sanderson to the Midge. On the 16th we got through Canal Canoe, having been six days beating up from St. Juan de los Remedios, destitute of provisions, and without a pilot. On getting into Guanaha Bay, I discovered a few small huts on Cayo Romano, and beat up as near to them as the channel would admit of, and came to. I directed Midshipman Hunter to take an interpreter with him, and proceed to the houses in quest of provisions and a pilot. On landing, he was met by two men, whom he addressed, telling them his business, and that he was an American. Thinking that they were fishermen, and that they were afraid of him in consequence of his being armed, he laid his arms on the beach, and directed the interpreter to do so also. Notwithstanding this, they continued to retreat towards the houses, and Mr. Hunter to follow them, until, on arriving near the houses, a party of ten or twelve men rushed upon them, and attempted to seize them. Mr. Hunter was captured, but the interpreter succeeded in effecting his escape to the boats amid a volley of musketry, with no other injury than a slight wound. Immediately on receiving this intelligence, I landed with a portion of the crews of both boats, and proceeded to the houses; but the pirates had fled, with the exception of three or four, at whom some of our men got a few shots, but with no other effect than compelling one of them to drop his load, consisting of liquors, preserved fruits, &c. It being late in the evening when we arrived at the huts, and our men excessively fatigued from their march, I determined to remain there that night, and proceed in pursuit of them the next morning. About midnight, Mr. Hunter returned. He informed me that the houses we then occupied were a part of an extensive slaughtering establishment. That immediately on his capture, the pirates took all the horses belonging to it, on which they mounted with their provisions, &c., and proceeded about twelve miles in the interior, leaving three or four of their gang well mounted at the huts to watch our motions. That he had been released on condition of his interceding with me to spare their boats; and that he thought he could pilot us to the place where he left them. At 2 A. M. on the 17th I proceeded with Mr. H. as a guide, and about twenty officers and men in pursuit of them. After a painful march, we arrived at the spot where they had encamped the night previous; but no traces of them remained. From the open nature of the country, and the advantage they possessed of being mounted, I was convinced that a further pursuit was hopeless, and therefore determined to abandon that mode, and attempt their capture by stratagem. I accordingly seized all the boats I could find on the island, and invested them in such a manner that their escape was impossible, unless by traveling a distance of eighty miles to the north end of the island. I attempted every stratagem that I could devise for their capture or destruction, and in one case with such success, that but for a flash of lightning which discovered to them some of our men, their capture was inevitable. We remained on the island six days, when our provisions being entirely exhausted, and many of our men sick from the constant exposure and fatigue they had undergone, I was compelled to leave them. I destroyed their boats, three in number, one large and two small ones, and a quantity of arms and ammunition which they had left behind them in the hurry of their retreat. I was compelled to do this from the impossibility of making any progress in our barges with the boats in tow.

On leaving there, I proceeded to Guanaha, where I obtained a supply of provisions. I learned that the villains we had left were part of a gang that was forming under the notorious pirate Antonio El Majorcan; that they were twenty in number, and had collected in the vicinity of that place for the purpose of seizing a Spanish felucca then in port, and nearly ready for sea, which they intended to fit out as a cruiser. I remained in Guanaha three days, in consequence of a heavy S. E. gale which prevented my proceeding any further to windward, and which, added to a scarcity of provisions, finally compelled me to bear up for this port. In running down the coast, I examined Cayos Verde and Confitos, and all the intermediate ports, &c., between them and this place. By discharging the ballast, water, provisions, &c., from our boats, we were enabled to ascend to the very source of the Rio Palmas. I am satisfied from the shoalness of the water over the bar (varying from six to eighteen inches in depth), the many obstructions in the river, and the marshy nature of its banks, that the prevalent opinion of its being a piratical depot is not founded on fact. On the 3d instant I arrived here, without having met with any disaster, and the officers and crews of all the boats in good health. During the whole of this long and arduous cruise, I am happy to state that I received every support from the officers and men attached to the expedition. Their fortitude, and even cheerfulness under the numerous privations and sufferings incident to a cruise in open boats, at this season of the year, was almost without a parallel, and justly entitles them to the gratitude of their country.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS W. FREELONS, Lieut. U. S. Navy.

Lieut. Commandant FRANCIS H. GREGORY, U. S. Schooner Grampus, Matanzas.

MINUTES OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF A GENERAL COURT-MARTIAL IN THE CASE OF CAPTAIN PORTER.

Minutes of a general court-martial, convened at the Navy yard, in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, on Thursday, the seventh day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, by virtue of a precept from the honorable the Secretary of the Navy, dated the twenty-third day of June, in the same year, hereunto annexed, and marked A.

Present: Captain James Barron, president; Captains Thomas Tingey, James Biddle, Charles G. Ridgeley, Robert T. Spence, John Downes, John D. Henley, Jesse D. Elliott, James Renshaw, Thomas Brown, Chas. C. B. Thompson, Alex. S. Wadsworth, and George W. Rogers, members, and Richard S. Coxe, judge advocate.

Captain David Porter appeared, to answer the charges that had been exhibited against him. He was asked by the judge advocate whether he had any objection to make to any of the members of the court.

The accused, by leave of the court, presented the paper marked B, which he read, and which is annexed to the record; whereupon the court was cleared, and after mature consideration, one of the members proposed the following question:

Shall the question whether the judge advocate be subject to challenge, be referred to the Attorney General, through the Secretary of the Navy? which was determined in the negative. The question was then, on motion, proposed to the court:

Is the judge advocate liable to be challenged by the accused?

One of the members of the court said that he did not feel himself competent to decide the question without legal advice. At his request the judge advocate was called upon by the court, for his opinion, which he gave, as follows:

Commodore Porter having taken an exception to my acting as judge advocate of the court, and the court having intimated a wish that I should give my opinion upon the question whether a challenge or exception may be taken by the accused to the judge advocate, I am of opinion that the appointment of the judge advocate rests with the government; and that he holds his office by the same authority which appoints the court; and that neither has the accused a right to make any exception before the court, nor has the court a right to decide upon any exception to the judge advocate. That no precedent of such challenge having ever been made, has been, or it is believed can be produced.

After reading this opinion, the question was put and decided in the negative; whereupon the court was opened, and the foregoing proceedings announced.

The oath prescribed by the law in such case was then administered by the judge advocate to the president and members of the court. And the oath prescribed to be taken by the judge advocate was administered to him by the president.

The charges and specifications were read by the judge advocate, annexed to the record, and marked C, and Captain Porter was asked whether he was guilty or not guilty. Captain Porter requested permission to postpone, till to-morrow morning, pleading to the same; and at the same time requested permission of the court to have counsel present in court to aid him—to have a clerk, to take minutes of the evidence, and also that he might be furnished with a copy of the charges and specifications, as read by the judge advocate. To all these propositions the court acceded; it being understood that the counsel of Captain Porter will be subject to the same restrictions as are usually adopted in courts-martial. Captain Porter mentioned Walter Jones, Esq., as the counsel whose presence he desired.

The court adjourned till ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

FRIDAY, July 8.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court, and the judge advocate.

A letter was received from the Secretary of the Navy, which was read, annexed to the record, and marked D, whereupon the court adjourned, to meet at the Marine barracks, in the city of Washington.

The court being opened pursuant to the adjournment, present as before, and Captain Porter. The minutes of the proceedings of yesterday were read.

Captain Porter was then called upon to plead to the charges. He requested, by way of plea, that he might be permitted to read by his counsel, and submit to the court, a paper containing remarks upon the charges. This being done, the paper, with the letter addressed to the accused by the Secretary of the Navy, therein referred to, covering a copy of the charges, and the copy of the charges furnished to him, were annexed to the record, and marked E. F. and G.

The judge advocate stated to the court that, as the exception therein pointed out by Commodore Porter had been waived by the accused, he should proceed with the case upon the charges, as read before the court yesterday; that the variation between the two papers which had been pointed out, was, that a letter referred to in the one, as dated the thirteenth day of April, was, in the other, by a mistake of the copying clerk, dated the thirtieth.

Alexander J. Dallas, a master commandant in the navy of the United States, being duly sworn, according to law, (and the other witnesses having been directed to withdraw,) deposes and says:

I commanded the John Adams, bearing the pendant of Commodore Porter. We arrived some time in November last at St. Thomas, in the island of that name. In the afternoon of the same day, Lieutenant Platt, in company with Mr. Cabot, an American gentleman, residing at St. Thomas, and as I understood officiating as commercial agent for the United States, came on board the vessel. They mentioned to Commodore Porter that Lieutenant Platt, on a visit to Foxardo, had been very harshly treated by the authorities there. The commodore, on receiving this information, determined to visit the place, and obtain an apology from those who had ill-treated Lieutenant Platt.

I was directed the following day to get under way with the John Adams, the Grampus and the Beagle being in company, and proceed to as near Foxardo as we could get. The wind proving light, and the pilot being of opinion that the draft of water of the John Adams was too great to permit an approach near the beach, the commodore directed me to anchor under one of the Passage islands; to get out all my boats, and to prepare an hundred and odd men for the expedition. These preparations taking so much time as to make it late in the afternoon, I was directed to be ready by one or two in the morning, to go on board the Grampus, which vessel would take the boats in tow. I did so, and we got under way in the schooner, and arrived the next morning about eight or nine o'clock in the harbor of Foxardo.

On our arrival there, we were directed to prepare the boats for landing. Immediately after landing, a battery was observed on the hill, at which there was a number of men, who, to all appearance, intended firing at us. The commodore directed one of the boats to proceed and dislodge the men at the battery, and to spike the guns. We then landed, and, after forming the men on the beach, Lieutenant Crabb, with a portion of the marines, was directed to advance on the road leading to the town of Foxardo, and to take a position there. Lieutenant Stribling was dispatched with a flag of truce and a letter from Commodore Porter to the alcalde of the town. Shortly after Mr. Stribling left us, we marched towards the town, leaving a guard of marines, under Lieutenant Barton, to take care of the boats. We marched to within from twenty to forty yards of where the marines under Lieutenant Crabbe were, where we halted to wait the return of Lieutenant Stribling. During our march, we fell in with a battery of two guns, which we also spiked.

After waiting some time in this position, Lieutenant Stribling was discovered returning from the town with two officers, who were said to be the alcalde and the captain of the port. A conversation, through the medium of an interpreter, took place between Commodore Porter and those persons, which resulted in an apology to Lieutenant Platt. The commodore asking the officers whether they were all satisfied, to which they assented. The commodore was then invited by the alcalde to visit him in the town. The commodore, in company with myself, and several other officers, and the marines under Lieutenant Crabbe, went so far as to lead us by the force collected; after which, the commodore returned, and gave orders for us all to return to the beach. At the beach, the men were refreshed with some grog, got into the boats, went on board the Grampus, and returned to the John Adams.

Question. At what hour did you leave the John Adams, to go to Foxardo?

Answer. Between one and two in the morning.

Ques. At what time was it expected you would arrive at your destination?

Ans. We calculated upon arriving very early in the morning.

Ques. Did any person from St. Thomas accompany you, besides the pilot?

Ans. I am under the impression that there was a young gentlemen, whose name I do not recollect.

Ques. Are you acquainted with the object for taking him?

Ans. No; I was not.

Ques. (By Capt. Rodgers.) Was not the visit of Commodore Porter to Foxardo, for the purpose of resenting an insult to the American flag, in the person of Lieut. Platt?

Ans It was the ostensible object.

Ques. (By the same.) Were not the arrangements of Commodore Porter to land in daylight?

Ans. It was his intention to land as early as possible, certainly by daylight; we calculated to arrive there by break of day.

Ques. (By the same.) Could you have made your arrangements to land at night?

Ans. We could have arranged to land at any time of the night.

Ques. (By the same.) In what positions did the schooners anchor in the harbor of Foxardo?

Ans. The Grampus anchored nearly opposite to the battery I have alluded to; the Beagle further up in the harbor.

Ques. Were the colors flying on board the schooners when they entered the harbor, and when they anchored?

Ans. I think they were.

Ques. Was the force dispatched to dislodge the Spaniards from the battery before or after the landing of Commodore Porter?

Ans. Before.

Ques. Had it returned before the landing?

Ans. No.

Ques. At what time did it join the main party, and where?

Ans. It joined us on the beach, and almost immediately on our landing.

Ques. How many men and officers landed?

Ans. I presume near two hundred.

Ques. How were they armed?

Ans. With muskets, bayonets, pistols, cutlasses and boarding-pikes.

Ques. How long after you landed was Lieut. Stribling dispatched to the town?

Ans. Almost immediately, or soon after our landing.

Ques. What amount of force had the Spaniards collected?

Ans. I cannot say what amount; but in passing them there appeared to be about sixty or seventy men with a field piece.

Ques. Did they appear to be regular troops or militia?

Ans. They had the appearance of militia; they were not in uniform.

Ques. Was there any complaint made to the authorities at Foxardo, or communication had with them by Commodore Porter on the subject of the insult offered to Lieutenant Platt, before you landed?

Ans. None that I knew of.

Ques. (By Capt. Rodgers.) Do you not think that the most effective way to obtain redress was by landing?

Ans. Yes.

Ques. (By Capt. Wadsworth.) At the time of your landing, was any inquiry made by the Spaniards as to what force it was?

Ans. None; I do not think there was an individual to be seen on the beach.

Ques. (By Capt. Ridgely.) Was there any act of hostility committed against any of the subjects of the King of Spain, previous to or after landing?

Ans. The boat that was sent to dislodge the men and spike the guns at the battery succeeded in the object; whether that was an act of hostility must be left to the court; if it was not, I know of none.

Ques. (By Capt. Tingey.) Was this act of courtesy by the authorities of Foxardo, by invitation into the town, after those transactions that you have related?

Ans. Yes.

Ques. (By the same.) Was any complaint or remonstrance made by the authorities at Foxardo to Commodore Porter, at any time during his stay on shore, against his proceedings there?

Ans. None that I know of.

Ques. (By Capt. Wadsworth.) Do you know the nature of the apology made by the alcalde and the captain of the port, which you say was satisfactory to Commodore Porter, and the officers accompanying him?

Ans. The apology was made to Lieutenant Platt for the injury done him; but I am not able to state the terms of it.

Ques. (By Capt. Brown.) What was the deportment of Commodore Porter towards the Spanish officers whom he met?

Ans. Gentlemanly and proper.

Ques. (By Capt. Henley.) Did Commodore Porter consult with you previous to his landing? If yea, state the amount of the consultation.

Ans. He did not consult me.

Ques. (By Capt. Ridgeley.) What was the conduct of the officers and men who landed, towards the subjects of the King of Spain whom they met?

Ans. We landed as I have stated, and marched up towards the town, committing no personal violence against any one; the conduct of the officers and men was correct.

Ques. (By Capt. Elliott.) From what you could perceive in Commodore Porter, previous to, at, and after his landing, with his force, at Foxardo, was he actuated by any other motive than to obtain an apology for the insult offered to one of the officers of his squadron?

Ans. It appeared to me the only motive.

Ques. (By Capt. Ridgeley.) Was not the place where you landed considered as one of the rendezvous of pirates.

Ans. It had been frequently said so; I knew nothing of it personally.

Ques. In the conversation between Commodore Porter and the authorities of Foxardo, was anything said on the subject of piracy or pirates, and was any demand made for pirates, or for property plundered by them?

Ans. None that I know of. I was not near enough, however, to hear the conversation between them; and it was not until the commodore asked the officers if they were satisfied with the apology that I approached near enough to hear them.

Cross-examined:

Questions by Commodore Porter to Capt. Dallas.

Ques. Were not our proper colors hoisted, both on the schooners and boats, when they came in sight of the harbor, and during the whole time of the approach and of the landing?

Ans. Yes.

Ques. Was not everything done openly and fairly, and in my own character, without any attempt to deceive?

Ans. Yes.

Ques. Did I not land in my uniform, though advised by some of my officers to take it off, lest it should make me too conspicuous?

Ans. You landed in your uniform; I do not recollect any advice.

Ques. Did you not, under all circumstances, consider it an effectual course on my part, to secure the officers from insult and interruption, whilst engaged in the pursuit of pirates in that quarter, by intimidating the inhabitants of those towns or districts, suspected of harboring and assisting the pirates?

Ans. Certainly, I think it was a course that would intimidate other places supposed to be a receptacle for pirates, and calculated to prevent them from suffering them to come there, and a means of obliging them to pay more respect unto our officers.

Ques. Were not the guns training on us at the time I ordered the party to land and spike them?

Ans. I think they were endeavoring to train them on us.

Ques. Did not Lieut. Stribling, on his return with the flag, inform me that the people or authorities of Foxardo had heard of my coming and were preparing resistance?

Ans. I heard of the circumstance, but do not recollect how or from whom I heard it.

Ques. Were not my orders to the party who landed, to spike the guns, without injury to the person or the property of any of the inhabitants; not to fire unless first fired upon, and generally to respect the persons and property of the inhabitants?

Ans. I consider those as the orders that were given.

Ques. Did any of the main body enter the town of Foxardo? and was not our whole force so disposed as to impress the people with a sense of our disposition, and our power to repel and punish aggression; at the same time that all actual violence was avoided?

Ans. The main body did not enter the town. To the latter clause of your question, I answer yes.

Ques. Was not the grog sent to the beach as a present from the town to the men?

Ans. I did not understand it in that way. The purser was directed to procure some, and when he offered to pay the person from whom he procured it, he was refused, and told it was intended as a present. The person from whom it was procured was one of those who accompanied the alcade and the flag.

Ques. After the negotiations and explanations were ended, did not the authorities and inhabitants appear well satisfied and acquiescent in my proceedings?

Ans. They accompanied us in considerable numbers down to the boats, and there was no other appearance than that of a good understanding between all parties.

Charles T. Platt, a lieutenant in the navy of the United States, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

On the 24th October, between the hours of seven and eight in the morning, Mr. Bedford, a clerk in the house of Messrs. Cabot & Bailey, commercial agents at St. Thomas, with a letter from those gentlemen, came on board the Beagle, then under my command, lying in the harbor of St. Thomas, informing me that their store had been robbed the preceding night, of goods to not less than the amount of $5,000. The letter contained a request for me to go in search of the goods. I then went ashore, and inquired of the merchants in that place who had been previously robbed, in order to ascertain whether I would be justifiable in proceeding in search of these goods to Foxardo, at the east end of Porto Rico. On making the inquiry, I was perfectly satisfied as far as I could be, without knowing positively, that the goods were then on their way to Foxardo. I accordingly got under way as speedily as I could, taking on board with me a pilot, and a clerk of Messrs. Cabot & Bailey, with a description of the goods contained in the advertisement herewith presented to the court, annexed, and marked 1. On the evening of the 26th, about 6 o'clock, I anchored in the harbor of Foxardo, with my colors flying. I was anxious, if possible, to get on shore that night, but my pilot, who acted not merely in that capacity, but as my guide and interpreter on shore, through ignorance or otherwise, declined going, stating that he was not able to show me the way at that late hour. In the morning of the 27th, at an early hour, a boat came alongside, with some person in it, bearing the appearance of a soldier, who informed me that the captain of the port was anxious to see me on shore, presenting his compliments at the same time. I was at that time preparing to go on shore. I was somewhat fearful that the character of the vessel was not known on shore. I asked the man if the character of the vessel was known on shore. He answered that it was. Lest he might have been mistaken, I told him to inform his commanding officer that it was the United States schooner Beagle, and that I should be on shore as soon as possible. So soon afterwards as was practicable, in company with Lieutenant Ritchie, Mr. Bedford, and the pilot, I visited the shore. On my landing, I was told that I could not proceed to town. This, however, I received from a parcel of ragamuffins, who appeared to me more like highwaymen, than anything I could compare them to. I attempted after this to go again on board my vessel; I was prevented from doing so. This led me to inquire what was the meaning of this course of conduct; whether they were authorized? I was informed by a citizen standing there, that they had no authority to detain me. In evidence of which, horses were procured (without my asking) by the citizens there for myself and all who were with me, to ride up to the village. On my arrival at the village, I reported myself, having been advised so to do by some of the citizens, first to the captain of the port; made known to him my business, the object of my visit, and reason for my appearing in citizen's dress, and also a letter to a Mr. Campos, showing the character of myself and vessel. Mr. Campos was a man who, from his wealth, stood high as a person of respectability. The captain of the port appeared to be perfectly satisfied with the character of myself and my vessel, took down the names of the officers and the force of the vessel, then directed me to call on the alcalde. I did so, and pursued the same course with him as with the captain of the port. He also appeared perfectly satisfied, and approved very much of my having come on shore in citizen's dress; said it was a very prudent and necessary precaution. He also expressed a confidence in succeeding in securing the goods; said he had no doubt but he should be able to procure them before night. This conversation was private; there might have been others in the room, but none were I believe within hearing, but the interpreter and ourselves.

The court, not being able to complete the examination of Lieut. Platt, adjourned till to-morrow morning, at 10 o'clock.

SATURDAY, July 9.

The court met pursuant to adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court (excepting Captain Elliott), the judge advocate, and Captain Porter.

The president announced to the court that Captain Elliott was sick and confined to his bed, and wholly unable to attend the meeting of the court to-day. The accused stated that he had no objection to the court proceeding in the business before it, and that when Captain Elliott should be able to resume his seat, the proceedings of the court during his absence should be read to him. Whereupon the court decided to proceed in the case.

The court resumed the examination of Lieutenant Platt:

The alcalde then informed me that the recovery of the goods might probably be attended with some expense. I stated to him that if it were necessary to offer a reward I was authorized to offer a reward of one thousand dollars, for which I considered the handbill yesterday presented to the court as a sufficient authority. I then proposed to the alcalde the propriety of my visiting the different stores, with the police and the clerk I had brought, for the purpose of examining and identifying the goods. The alcalde observed that, as I had very properly come on shore in citizen's dress to prevent any suspicion, it was advisable to let the matter rest entirely with him; that, were I to accompany him, though in citizen's dress, suspicion might be excited. I then left his office under the impression that the goods would be procured before night by the police of the place. A short time after I received a message from the alcalde, saying that he wished to see me at his office; I was then fully under the impression that he had obtained some information which would lead to the recovery of the goods. Under this impression I went over to the office, accompanied by Lieut. Ritchie and the pilot. On my arrival I inquired of the alcalde whether he had sent for me, and for what purpose. I was answered by the captain of the port, in the most insulting, most provoking, and most aggravating manner that it is possible to imagine, saying that he had sent for me himself, to demand of me my register, on the refusal of which he would confine me in prison. I told them that I thought I had already satisfied them of the character of the vessel; that I had no register to show them; that a man-of-war carried none; that my commission, my uniform, and my colors, were all that I had to show to establish my character; that I had already offered to exhibit these, which they considered unnecessary, being perfectly satisfied of my character without it. I then expressed my astonishment at the course of conduct they had pursued, so unexpected and so unprecedented; and, furthermore, that I conceived it to be a duty which I owed to my country, to myself, and to the officers under my command, to make a formal report of their conduct to Commodore Porter. Lest, however, they might deny having confined me, I left the office with the intention of returning on board my vessel, and leaving the port, not considering myself as a prisoner by their mere say-so. I had proceeded about five rods from the alcalde's house when I was pursued by the alcalde himself and two soldiers; the alcalde himself seized me by the collar. I was brought back and placed under charge of a sentry. After perhaps an hour's debate, among themselves, I inquired of their interpreter what they meant to do; he informed me that, as they were not satisfied with my character, my having shown no evidence thereof, they were determined to keep me confined until I should produce some such evidence, or they should hear from St. John's. I then requested permission to go on board with any officer they might choose to send, whom I pledged to satisfy of the character of myself and vessel. This, however, was denied me. I then requested that I might send Mr. Ritchie or the pilot on board; that they might keep me in bondage if they chose. All was denied me. There was no chance left. I then made another proposition, that I should send a note by any officer of theirs whom they pleased, and pledge myself that, if he did not return, they might then do with me as they thought proper. This was refused. After perhaps another hour, they permitted me to send Mr. Bedford on board for my commission, which, at the time, they said was all they would require. I however, directed him to bring my commission and uniform. So soon as he returned, I put on my uniform and presented my commission. After consulting again for perhaps half an hour, they pronounced my commission a forgery, and me and my officers a damned pack of pirates. I then, finding the probability of my being confined there sometime, proposed the propriety of going to some decent house, where they might place sentry over me. In answer to this, the King's house was recommended, as I understood. I being, at the time, fully under the impression that the King's house was the most genteel house in the place, invited Mr. Ritchie, and even the pilot, to accompany me, they being prisoners like myself. On my approaching near enough to discover that it was a mere guard-house, well calculated to produce the yellow fever or plague, I declined taking up my lodgings there unless they forced me to do it. After some few minutes they consented to let me return to the alcalde's office under charge of a sentry. Being fully aware of my unpleasant situation, I again, although repugnant to my feelings, did ask the interpreter what furthermore they required of me. After making the inquiry of the proper authorities, he answered that I had shown no other commission than one as lieutenant, and not one as lieutenant commandant. They were determined to keep me there until they could hear from St. John's, or until I produced something that was satisfactory. I asked permission to send Mr. Bedford again on board, which was granted. I directed him to bring all my papers on shore, that I might come across some paper which might be satisfactory, and which it would not be improper to show them. On the return of Mr. Bedford, I produced the orders from Commodore Porter to me, directing me so take command of the Beagle. They told me an appointment of that kind could not emanate from anything less than an admiral, and that they were thoroughly satisfied that I was a pirate. As for Commodore Porter, there was no such man in our navy, and that I could not hoax them in that way. They still continued me confined until a late hour in the afternoon; towards sundown, they, without any further application from me, and for what reason I know not, released me and allowed me to go aboard my vessel. We left the village, mortified, very properly, hissed at by the ruff-scuff of the place; went on board, got under way, and proceeded to St. Thomas.

On the 12th November, Commodore Porter arrived at St. Thomas, in the John Adams; as soon as he came to anchor, I visited the vessel, reported myself to him, and mentioned to him the circumstances which led to my visit to Foxardo, and the treatment I had met with. The commodore informed me it was necessary I should make out a written report. I stated to him it should have been prepared, had I expected him so soon, and that he should have it. The commodore said that, if circumstances justified my going in the manner in which I went, that he would visit Foxardo, and obtain redress for the insult offered to me and to the flag. I referred the commodore to Messrs. Cabot and Bailey, and to Mr. Furness—both houses being commercial agents at that place. I went on shore at the request of the commodore, to request Mr. Cabot to come on board, (Mr. Furness was then on board,) and to procure a pilot to carry us to Foxardo. Mr. Cabot returned on board with me. The next morning I got under way with the Beagle, having the pilot on board, stood out of the harbor of St. Thomas to join the John Adams, then under way, delivered my written report to the commodore, and was directed by him to proceed ahead with the pilot for Foxardo. The wind, however, proved light, and [illegible]mpelled to lay to, off and on, during the night. The next morning I was hailed from the [illegible]s, and [illegible]d to proceed ahead as before. For reasons unknown to me, the commodore gave an order, and the vessels came to anchor about nine o'clock in the morning of the 13th, under the lee of Passage Island. At midnight of the 13th, the Grampus, Beagle, the barges and boats of the Adams, with as many officers and men as could conveniently be spared, got under way, and, about eight o'clock next morning, arrived in the harbor of Foxardo. The barges were manned and officered; one barge was sent to attack a fort on an eminence, mounting two guns. The rest of the men landed on the beach. The Grampus was anchored off the battery; the Beagle, passing by the battery, anchored so as to cover the landing of the men. I was directed by Commodore Porter, as he passed me, to follow him with as many men as I could conveniently carry in my boat. Lieut. Stribling, about the time of our landing, was dispatched to the town with a flag of truce, and a communication from Commodore Porter to the authorities of the place. About fifteen minutes after our landing, we were directed to fall into line, and march up. We got there in perhaps about fifteen or twenty minutes from the time we started from the beach. On the outskirts of the town, I mentioned to the commodore that there were two guns on a causeway, on the road to the village. He ordered some officers and men to spike them. After arriving at about forty or fifty rods from the village, we halted; a short time after, we discovered a white flag, which proved to be the flag of Lieut. Stribling, accompanied by the alcalde, the captain of the port, the interpreter, and a number of the citizens. When they met Commodore Porter, they professed their ignorance of the object of his visit. The commodore stated to them that they ought to have known the object of his visit from the tenor of his note; that he came there for the purpose of obtaining suitable redress, or an apology, for the insult that had been offered to the flag of the United States in my person, (pointing to me.) This seemed, at first, to create some considerable astonishment on their part, that they should be accused of having treated me in any way improper. The commodore then asked the alcalde, in a very positive manner, whether he had not imprisoned me. His answer was, that he had—after knowing my character, as an officer in the United States navy; but, that he was not to blame, for that he had been compelled to do it by others.

The commodore then t[illegible] him that, as he was the chief magistrate of the place, he had nothing to do with others, and that he should regard him as responsible for any acts of violence that might have been committed on me; that there was then no time for any altercation; that the time had expired, within five or seven minutes, which he had allowed them; that an apology was necessary—such a one as should be dictated by him; a refusal of which would compel him to resort to arms, which should terminate in the final destruction of the village. An apology was made. It was, that they had imprisoned me wrongfully; that they were sorry for it, and that, in future, they would respect United States naval officers, as their character deserved. After that, we were pressingly invited to come into the village, and strongly urged to take some refreshments. Commodore Porter did advance—passed by a six-pounder, which was primed, and a man standing by with a lighted match, and a number of armed men that had been collected. He then ordered us to return to the beach, without entering into the heart of the village. The commodore informed me, at the beach, that it was at first his intention to have accepted the invitation, and entered the village with the men, but, apprehensive that some difficulties might arise amongst the sailors and men, he thought it better to return, and have the refreshments brought down to the beach. The refreshments were brought down, we partook of them, proceeded to sea, and rejoined the John Adams.

Question. Was it the object of your visit to Foxardo, to recover the property that had been stolen at St. Thomas, or to obtain the persons who had perpetrated the robbery, or both?

Answer. The object of my visit was to obtain the property, and the pirates, as they were supposed to be, through the police, and through them only.

Ques. Was the United States flag flying on board the Beagle, during the time that she lay in the harbor of Foxardo?

Ans. The flag was flying when we arrived, and was hoisted again at nine o'clock, on the following morning, as I presume, such being my orders, and such the regulations of the service.

Ques. Was there any flag, ensign, or other distinction, displayed at the time of your landing?

Ans. None.

Ques. When you landed, do you suppose that the Beagle was known on shore to be an American man-of-war?

Ans. I feel perfectly satisfied that her character was known.

Ques. Were there many persons on the shore who saw you land from her?

Ans. Probably fifteen or twenty.

Ques. What was your object in landing without your uniform?

Ans. To prevent any suspicion on the part of the boats in the harbor of which there was a great number.

Ques. Could not the flag of the vessel be seen as well from those boats as from the village of Foxardo, and the character of the Beagle as well ascertained?

Ans. Yes, but all merchant vessels carry the same flag that we did.

Ques. Had you, when you landed, any document of any description to verify your claim to the character of an American officer? If so, what was it?

Ans. We carried a letter from one of the most respectable mercantile houses in St. Thomas, to Mr. John Campos, a merchant in Foxardo.

Ques. Was that an open or sealed letter?

Ans. It was a sealed letter, but had been read to me before it was sealed. It was given me for the purpose of enabling me to go on shore in disguise.

Ques. Did you see Mr. Campos while on shore?

Ans. I met him at the entrance of the village, before seeing the captain of the port and the alcalde?

Ques. When did you hand him the letter?

Ans. The moment I arrived at the village.

Ques. Did he accompany you to the house of the captain of the port and the alcalde?

Ans. He was at the captains's of the port, I think, and certainly at the alcalde's, and read the letter to them both in my presence.

Ques. Do you know whether Mr. Campos had, or had not, at that time, in his possession, the goods of which you were in search?

Ans. I do not know personally; I can only judge from the evidence that I brought home, and am fully under the impression that he was, at that time, in possession of the goods.

Ques. When you were interrupted on the beach on your landing, do you suppose those who did it knew you to be an American officer?

Ans. Yes.

Ques. From what circumstance?

Ans. Because they had sent a boat alongside of me, and said they knew my character, and I had sent word to them before landing of my character.

Ques. Did you inform the citizens, who interfered in your behalf on the beach, who you were, and what was the object of your visit?

Ans. I mentioned that I was an American officer in command of the Beagle, and that I wished to report myself to the proper authorities.

Ques. Did you in person proceed to any of the stores in town, to inquire after the goods you were in quest of?

Ans. I was in no store in the place, except Mr. Campos' store, when I went to see him. I was in one other, the store of the gentleman who had lent me his horse; I was asked into his house, and passed into the store, but no further, and, with Mr. Bedford, privately examined some of the goods, to see if they corresponded with what had been taken. This was not done with the view of interfering with the authorities.

Ques. Did you see Mr. Campos after you first left the office of the alcalde?

Ans. Yes; I found him there when I went to the alcalde's, after being sent for; he was engaged in conversation with the rest, and appeared very much confused.

Ques. Did you appeal to him to verify your character, and what was his reply?

Ans. I appealed to him; he replied that he had stated my character; urged Mr. Bedford and myself to go to another place to look for the goods, which I declined; he offered us horses to go, and I believe that if I had been disposed to go, they would have released us.

Ques. During the period that elapsed between your first visit to Foxardo, and your seeing Commodore Porter, at St. Thomas, had you made any report of the affair to him or to the government?

Ans. None, whatever. I expected him at St. Thomas, (where I was directed to await his arrival,) though not so soon as he actually came.

Ques. Did you during that period, consider that the flag of the United States had received an insult which required atonement?

Ans. Yes, I did.

Ques. Did Mr. Bedford, or any other person, accompany you to Foxardo, on the second visit? and if so, for what purpose?

Ans. Mr. Bedford went down on the second visit, but did not not land. The object was that, if any discovery should be made, he might be there to identify the goods.

Ques. In the conversations between Commodore Porter and the authorities, was anything said on the subject of those goods, and what?

Ans. I do not recollect that anything was said on the subject.

Ques. What is the distance betwen the beach where you landed, and the village of Foxardo?

Ans. About a mile and a half.

Ques. Had any complaint been made, or explanation asked, either by yourself or Commodore Porter, for the insult you had received, either of the authorities at Foxardo, or of the island, before your second visit?

Ans. None by myself, and none that I know of by the Commodore.

Ques. (By Captain Rodgers.) What is the character of the inhabitants of Foxardo? Is it considered a place of refuge for pirates, and are not pirates openly protected there?

Ans. Yes, I have heard so; I have understood that hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of property had been stolen at St. Thomas, and remnants, or parts of the goods, discovered there and in the neighborhood.

Ques. (By Captain Thompson.) Will you please to state to the court the particular instruction under which you thought yourself authorized to land at Foxardo, in order to recover the property in question?

Ans. The instructions under which I acted were the general instructions from Commodore Porter, of which I was furnished with a copy, as well as the other vessels in the squadron, annexed and marked H.

Ques. (By same.) Do you know the house of Cabot, Bailey & Co. to be accredited agents of the Government of the United States?

Ans. I know them to be respected as such by the authorities at St. Thomas, and that they act as magistrates; I mean that Mr. Cabot is.

Cross-examined by the accused:

Questions to Lieutenant Platt by Commodore Porter.

Question. Had not the Island of Porto Rico, and especially the district about Foxardo, been notorious, from common report, before and at the time of your visit, as a rendezvous and refuge for such of the pirates as were unable to keep the sea, who were generally said to make that their retreat with their plunder, after marauding expeditions?

Answer. Yes.

Ques. Were not those reports communicated to me, and did I not receive frequent and heavy complaints of the piratical character of Foxardo and the country around?

Ans. Yes; I was present at a conversation between Commodore Porter and respectable merchants at St. Thomas, after his arrival on the 12th of November; they stated that protection was afforded to pirates by the inhabitants of Foxardo; that they were generally believed to be concerned with the pirates They referred him to respectable gentlemen on shore, who had letters from respectable people to that effect.

Ques. Were not the guns of the battery trained on the Grampus, as she lay abreast of the battery, before any order was given to land?

Ans. I do not know; they were so trained before they left the Grampus.

Ques. Did the party who had landed to strike the guns, make any attack or offer any violence to the persons at the battery, or use any force to dislodge them?

Ans. The party landed and took possession of the fort; the Spaniards abandoned it before our men reached them.

Ques. Was not the most perfect order preserved among our men on the march to Foxardo?

Ans. Yes.

Ques. Was any violence or injury of any kind committed by any of our men upon the persons or property of any of the inhabitants?

Ans. None whatever.

Ques. Were not the grog shops on the road from the harbor to the town thrown open, and temptingly set out with drink, and without any protection?

Ans. They were; liquor was brought out and offered to me as we were returning; I did not see anything of the sort as we went up.

Ques. Did you see or hear of any instance of the men's quitting their ranks to enter these shops; and had they any other means of getting refreshment until their return to the beach?

Ans. None whatever.

Ques. Were you near us during my conference with the alcalde; and did you hear distinctly what passed?

Ans. Yes; I was alongside of him.

Ques. Did I not exact, in addition to the apology for their ill-treatment of you, a promise that aid and assistance should be furnished, and respect shown to American officers, who might go to Foxardo in pursuit of pirates; and did not the alcalde promise such aid and respect, so far as lay in his power?

Ans. Yes; that they should be respected, and the alcalde promised it.

Ques. Did not the alcalde, on being asked by me why he had put you in confinement, say that he could not avoid it; that he had been compelled to do so by the others?

Ans. Yes.

Ques. Did you not understand from the said conversation, and the excuses made by the alcalde, that there was some mystery in the transaction; and that the regular authorities of the place had been interrupted, and forced from their duty by the irregular interference of unauthorized persons?

Ans. I drew that conclusion from the conversation that passed and the apology made.

Ques. Did you not ask the alcalde in my presence, if the goods had been recovered, and did he not answer no?

Ans. I do not recollect anything of the kind.

Ques. Did you know at the time you went first to Foxardo, that Campos had the goods, or did you get the information afterwards?

Ans. I received the information since.

Ques. Did you hear from many of the persons on shore, after my interview with the alcalde, that they had been expecting me, and preparing to resist me?

Ans. I understood from the interpreter that the visit was not unexpected to him; that he anticipated it.

Ques. Did not the alcalde, and the inhabitants generally, appear to be perfectly satisfied with my proceedings, and did we not all part in good fellowship, and with mutual civilities?

Ans. They did.

Ques. Did you hear any complaint from any of the inhabitants, of my landing, or of the treatment they received?

Ans. None whateevr.

Ques. Upon your arrival at St. Thomas, after your confinement at Foxardo, what American officer did you find in command there; and did you report to him, either verbally or in writing; or did you give him information of what had passed at Foxardo; and what advice or instructions did he give you?

Ans. Lieutenant Sloat came in some days after. I informed him what had passed, but made no formal report to him. He expressed an opinion that it was no more than we had a right to expect from them, but gave no advice.

Ques. Did you make a formal report to me of those transactions, immediately on my arrival at St. Thomas?

Ans. I did, as I have before stated.

Ques. Did you afterwards convoy vessels to Ponce, Porto Rico, or go there on other official business, by order of Lieutenant Sloat; and how were you received and treated there, by the authorities and inhabitants? Was it not with marked distinction and hospitality?

Ans. I went, not only by orders of Lieutenant Sloat, but of myself. I visited Ponce some time after, in consequence of the accompanying letter from Mr. Furness (read, annexed to the record, and marked 2,) where I was received with the greatest possible attention and respect. I was invited to a public dinner, where there were about forty of the most respectable citizens; and it was known that I was the same person who had visited Foxardo, and I landed in the same uniform that I had on at Foxardo. The particulars of my visit appear in a report made by me to Commodore Porter, dated February 10th, 1825 (read, annexed, and marked 3).

Ques. Did they make any such remark as this, that they were determined to show by their conduct towards you, that they were not pirates, and did you understand them as alluding to the affair of Foxardo?

Ans. No; I understood they were mortified at the treatment I had received at Foxardo, and were determined to show they were a different sort of people.

Ques. Did not some of the most respectable inhabitants of Foxardo apologize for the conduct of the alcalde, towards you, by saying he was somehow under the influence of the populace?

Ans. Yes; the interpreter himself told me that the alcalde was swayed by others, and an Irish gentleman there took a very active part on the occasion.

The court adjourned until 10 o'clock on Monday morning.

MONDAY, July 11.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of Saturday. Present: all the members of the court (excepting Captain Wadsworth), the judge advocate, and Captain Porter.

A letter was read to the court, from Captain Wadsworth to the president, accompanied with a certificate from his attending physician, stating that he was too much indisposed to be able to attend the court-martial this day.

The court (the accused assenting) took the same order on this occasion as on Saturday, in consequence of the absence of Captain Elliott.

The minutes of the proceedings of Saturday were then read by the judge advocate.

The examination of Lieutenant Platt was resumed:

Ques. (By the president of the court.) How far is it from Foxardo to St. Johns, and is the communication between the places frequent?

Ans. I understand the distance is about forty or forty-five miles, and that the communications between the places are daily.

Ques. (By Captain Porter.) Was it generally anticipated and understood by the officers of the navy on the station, and by the persons at St. Thomas, who had heard of the treatment you had received at Foxardo, that I should proceed to the latter place and get satisfaction for their conduct, and that in so doing I should land with an armed force, and march to the town?

Ans. It was hoped by the merchants and respectable citizens of the place that such would be the case, and was wished for by the officers on the station.

Ques. Did this general anticipation of my intended course proceed from any communication from me, to the officers or others, of my intended operations, or merely from the general opinion of the propriety or necessity of the measure?

Ans. From the opinion of the propriety and necessity of the measure.

Ques. Was it the general opinion, and your own, that the course which it was supposed I intended to pursue was a necessary and effectual measure to repress piracy, and ensure respect and protection to our officers and detachments, when landing in the discharge of their duty?

Ans. Yes, it was thought to be necessary that such a stand should be taken, until it happened no vessel dared leave the port without the protection of a man-of-war.

Ques. Was it the general opinion, and your own, from your experience of the consequences of the operation at Foxardo, that it had made the most beneficial impression, and had produced effects of great practical utility in the accomplishment of the general objects of our cruise, the suppression of piracy?

Ans. It was decidedly my impression; and the subsequent treatment I have received from the authorities in the Spanish West India islands, and their conduct since, has created this impression. I never before knew of any aid or assistance being furnished by the authorities of Porto Rico; it has been done since.

Ques. Had you not been cruising a considerable time before your first visit to Foxardo, in the neighborhood of that place and St. Thomas in the Beagle? Was not the Beagle well known in those parts—and was there not daily and hourly intercourse by means of small boats between St. Thomas and Foxardo?

Ans. Yes, I had been on the station a short time. I had been cruising in the neighborhood of Foxardo within sight of the east end of the island, before I went to St. Thomas, and there was a constant communication between Foxardo and St. Thomas.

The examination of this witness being closed, at the request of a member who had a proposition to submit, the court was cleared.

The proposition having been submitted, after deliberating upon the same, the court adopted the following resolution:

It appearing to the court that what purports to be the proceedings of this court, and particularly the evidence given by the witnesses who have heretofore been examined, have been published in a newspaper of this city; and this course appearing highly objectionable, and, in particular, virtually annulling a special rule of all courts-martial—that no witness, previous to his examination, shall be permitted to know what testimony has been given by any other person; it is ordered by the court that no spectator, other than such persons as may be particularly employed by Captain Porter, and for his use, be permitted to take minutes of the proceedings of the court.

Whereupon, the court was opened, and the foregoing proceedings announced.

Robert Ritchie, a lieutenant in the navy of the United States, being duly sworn, according to law, deposes and says:

I landed, in company with Mr. Platt, at Foxardo, on the morning of the 27th of October. Mr. Bedford, a clerk of Messrs. Cabot and Bailey, and the pilot, were in company. It was about six or seven in the morning. We met a number of men on the beach. One man, with a cutlass in his hand, but without any appearance of being an officer or soldier, addressed Lieutenant Platt, asked him for his register. Lieutenant Platt replied that he carried no register—told him what vessel it was—that it was the United States schooner Beagle. He inquired for the captain of the port, and was told he lived at Foxardo. One of the citizens offered to show us the way, and we started off. We saw the captain of the port on our arrival at the town—told him our business. Mr. Platt told him he had come on shore in citizen's dress; that he had brought with him a clerk of the house whose goods had been stolen. The captain of the port asked Lieutenant Platt for his register; he replied that he carried none; he was satisfied apparently. Mr. Platt showed him the letter he had for Mr. Campos; he sent a young man with us to show us where Mr. Campos resided. On our leaving him, he appeared perfectly satisfied. After Mr. Campos had read the letter, he offered to render us all the service in his power—said it would be necessary for us to go over to the alcalde's house, and he would forward our views. On our arrival there, we found the captain of the port. Mr. Campos related to the alcalde what our object was; he appeared perfectly satisfied, and shook hands with us after an introduction. Mr. Campos then requested the alcalde and the captain of the port to go into a private room, that he wished to speak with them. The door was shut; we heard them in conversation. Mr. Platt proposed to me to go over and get some breakfast, as they were busy. We had just finished our breakfast, when a negro came over with a sword in his hand, and told us the captain of the port wished to see us. On our arrival at the alcalde's house, the captain of the port came up to Lieutenant Platt, and demanded of him his register. He replied, I told you, and I tell you again, my vessel carries no register. He appeared very angry, and said he would detain us until he heard from St. John's. Lieutenant Platt then attempted to leave them. The alcalde took him by the arm, and said he must consider himself a prisoner. He asked why he was detained as a prisoner. The captain of the port replied, you are nothing but a pirate. I began to walk to and fro, and he ordered me into the same room where Lieutenant Platt was—and he said if we were not satisfied with that, he would order us to the King's house. Just at that moment, a gentleman came up and accosted me by name. His name is Craft—he is a planter in the island. He asked me what my difficulty was, and I told him. He turned round to the captain of the port, told him who I was, that he had seen me at St. John's, at the funeral of Lieutenant Cocke, and knew me to be an American officer. He reasoned with the captain of the port upon the impropriety of his conduct, when he knew me to be an officer in the navy. The captain of the port appeared very angry, was walking about, swearing in Spanish. Lieutenant Platt asked him if he would allow me, or any one present, to go on board his vessel and get his commission. He said no, he would send us to the city—St. John's. The gentleman who acted as interpreter, and had been alcalde before, offered himself to go; he objected to that, and allowed Mr. Bedford, (the clerk of Mr. Cabot,) and Mr. Campos to go. They brought both our uniform coats ashore, and Mr. Platt's commission. The commission was read to him by the interpreter. He threw it on the table, said it was a forgery, that there was no lieutenant commandant in it. The captain of the port then became very abusive, walked about, and I could frequently hear him talk of Commodore Porter and the officers. I then attempted to come out of the door, and two negroes who stood there with cutlasses ordered me back. Some conversation took place between the captain of the port, the alcalde, and the interpreter in the back part of the room, but I could not understand what was said. The interpreter then came forward, and asked Lieutenant Platt whether he had anything to show that he was lieutenant commandant, for that the captain of the port, as he said, was so ignorant he could not beat it into his head. He said he had his appointment from Commodore Porter, which he could show them—his orders to the vessel. Mr. Campos in the meanwhile had brought horses there, and told Lieutenant Platt he might probably get the goods at a small town about twenty miles off, the name of which is Naguaba. Mr. Platt declined going, and sent Mr. Bedford and Mr. Campos on board for all his papers. It was some time before they returned with the papers, and we were kept, in the meanwhile, guarded in the room by the negroes. When they returned with the papers, Lieutenant Platt showed the captain of the port his orders. The captain of the port did not appear satisfied with the papers, until the interpreter and Mr. Craft told him they knew it to be Commodore Porter's signature, that they had seen it before. At this time a number of citizens had met in the room together;—a long conversation took place between the alcalde, the captain of the port, and the citizens. Mr. Craft and the interpreter, who appeared very warm in our favor, told them the impropriety of their conduct in detaining us. They at last agreed about sunset, to let us return to our vessel. We proceeded towards the vessel, and at the outskirts of the town saw some blackguards there, who laughed at us. We took no notice of them, but passed on, got on board the schooner about seven or eight o'clock, and made the best of our way to St. Thomas.

We told the captain of the port while he had us detained, that Commodore Porter was coming out, and we should acquaint him with our treatment. Neither the alcalde nor the captain of the port had any uniform on; I asked them why they had no uniform on; they said it was none of my business.

On the morning of the 14th November, we arrived in the harbor of Foxardo, under the command of Commodore Porter. Standing in, the commodore hailed Lieutenant Platt, and told him to stand in, and cover with his schooner the landing of the troops. We did so, and had everything clear for action. After the men from the Grampus and the boats had landed, the commodore, in passing by, ordered Lieutenant Platt to come on shore. I landed with Mr. Platt; the troops were then ordered to march. Before we got on shore, Lieutenant Crabbe had marched with the marines, and Mr. Stribling had gone with the flag. Mr. Pendergrast, and the party who had spiked the guns on the hill, just joined us. We all marched off, leaving Mr. Barton, with a party of marines, to guard the boats. On our passing two guns, about a quarter of a mile from the beach, the commodore directed Mr. Pendergrast to spike them, which was done. On our arrival near the town, I observed Mr. Crabbe, with the marines, stationed about four or five hundred yards from a field piece at the entrance of the town. The commodore then ordered the men to halt about one hundred yards from Mr. Crabbe. After we had been there about ten or fifteen minutes, I observed Mr. Stribling with the flag, coming down with the alcalde and the captain of the port. When they arrived, the commodore requested all the officers to assemble together under a tree. The commodore told the alcalde the object of his visit; that he must make an apology to Lieutenant Platt for his treatment, satisfactory to the officers around. He did apologize. The commodore then told him that, should any officer hereafter land there, he must treat him with every respect that was due to him. The commodore then shook hands with both of them. They gave him an invitation to go into the town. The commodore asked if there were any refreshments, he wished some for his men. I pointed out a man with whom we had breakfasted, who said he would furnish liquor. The commodore walked into the edge of the town with the alcalde and the captain of the port. He then wished them good-by, and said he should march his men down to the beach, where they could get the refreshments. I believe I was the last man out of the town. Mr. Campos came up, and asked me if I would carry a letter from him to Mr. Bergeest, at St. Thomas. I said yes, provided it would not detain me. I asked him if he had heard anything of the stolen goods. He said he had not, though he had made every inquiry. He went for the letter, but not returning soon enough, I proceeded to the beach. On my return, I found the houses that had been deserted as we went up, had their inhabitants in them; they took off their hats to me as I passed, and gave me some water to drink. I got down just as the men did with the liquor. It was paid for, and we went off. Several persons on the beach on our return offered us cocoa nuts.

Question. When you arrived on the first occasion in the harbor of Foxardo, and while you remained there, were your colors flying on board the Beagle?

Answer. When we arrived it was just at sunset. The colors were then flying; and as we landed, Mr. Platt ordered them to be hoisted at 9 o'clock.

Ques. Do you think that when you landed, the character of the vessel was known to the people on shore?

Ans. I think so; for a man who had come off to us, had by this time landed, and I presume had acquainted them with our character.

Ques. Was there any interruption offered to you on the beach when you landed?

Ans. Only by the man that I before mentioned, who had a sword in his hand, and his head tied up.

Ques. Was your character announced to the people on the beach?

Ans. Yes.

Ques. Was it known to all with whom you spoke that you were American officers?

Ans. Yes.

Ques. What was the object of landing without your uniforms?

Ans. We thought it would increase our prospect of success if it was not known who we were.

Ques. Why then did you announce who you were?

Ans. We announced it to the authorities as we had intended, and to the man on the beach: we knew we could get up to the town before him.

Ques. Did Lieutenant Platt and yourself examine any of the goods in any of the retail stores in the town, or make any inquiries there as to the goods?

Ans. No; we had asked permission of the alcalde to do so, and it was refused us.

Ques. Did either of you go to any of the stores?

Ans. No; the man who kept the public house had a store, but we did not go in; and we first entered Mr. Campos' store, but did not examine any of the goods

Ques. What was the treatment you received from the inhabitants of Foxardo, besides the alcalde and the captain of the port?

Ans. We received from four or five gentlemen there very kind treatment, but from the lower classes our treatment was rough.

Ques. Did those who were rough in their behavior, appear to know who you were?

Ans. I do not know. Mr. Craft mentioned to the persons in the house of the alcalde and around the door, who we were.

Ques. Did they carry you, or order you to the jail?

Ans. They ordered me, and the alcalde took Mr. Platt, and led him into a room in his house, and they also spoke of sending us to the King's house. The room in which we were kept was occupied as a stable, the front room was occupied as his office. On reflection, I recollect that Mr. Platt, accompanied by the two negroes, was ordered to the jail, which was about fifty yards from the alcalde's house. I did not accompany him; he was absent only a few moments.

Ques. Did you at the time attribute the conduct of the captain of the port and the alcalde to their ignorance of your character, or to a wish to insult the American flag in your persons?

Ans. I thought at the time they wished to insult us; I afterwards understood they were bribed by Mr. Campos to do it. I had no idea they were ignorant of our character.

Ques. When you were released, were you ordered to go on board your vessel with any insulting language?

Ans. Not by anybody else than those I have spoken of at the outskirts of the town. At leaving the captain of the port, I told him the commodore would pay him a visit shortly; he shook his cane at me, and said something in Spanish, which from his manner I thought was abuse.

Ques. When the Grampus and Beagle entered and anchored in the harbor at Foxardo, were their colors flying, and were they prepared for action?

Ans. Yes; the commodore's broad pendant was flying on board the Grampus; the flags were flying on board the Beagle, and the boats and all were ready for action.

Ques. Where did the Grampus anchor?

Ans. The Grampus anchored abreast of the battery on the hill.

Ques. Did you see any preparations making in that battery to fire on you, and how soon after anchoring?

Ans. As we were standing in, I saw a number of men standing in the battery on the hill, a company to each gun, and I thought they were preparing for action.

Cross examination on the part of the accused:

Ques. Did you not find, on your first visit to Foxardo, some person or persons in search of property stolen from other islands besides St. Thomas?

Ans. Yes.

Ques. Had you any doubt at the time of your detention at Foxardo, that they all perfectly knew the real character of yourselves and vessel?

Ans. I had no doubt of it.

Ques. From information since obtained, what do you believe to have been the real object of the persons who caused your detention?

Ans. I thought at the time the object was to insult us; I have since received information which has induced me to believe that Mr. Campos at that time had the goods in his possession, and that he had bribed the alcalde and the captain of the port to act towards us as they did.

Ques. Before my visit to Foxardo, and at the time I proceeded from St. Thomas on the expedition to Foxardo, was that place and the district around notorious as the haunt and refuge of pirates?

Ans. Yes, I have understood from good authority that they plundered not only on the high seas, but on shore.

Ques. Was the general opinion of the officers, and of other persons interested in the suppression of piracy, decidedly in favor of my expedition to Foxardo; and was it not generally anticipated and thought proper, after the insult to Lieut. Platt?

Ans. Yes.

Ques. Were the practical effects and consequences of my operations at Foxardo found to be highly beneficial and useful; and was the measure applauded even in Spanish towns and in Porto Rico itself?

Ans. Yes, particularly at Ponce and Aguadilla, where I afterwards was.

Horatio N. Crabbe, a lieutenant in the marine corps of the United States, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

I was on board the John Adams as commanding marine officer of the guard. On our arrival at St. Thomas, we heard of an outrage that had been committed by the authorities at Foxardo upon the persons of Lieutenants Platt and Ritchie. We proceeded from St. Thomas, for the purpose, as I understood, of obtaining satisfaction for the insult. The schooners Grampus and Beagle were in company, and we anchored with the ship off Passage Island. The boats of the ship and the men to be taken from her were got in readiness for service. We left the Adams about sunset on the evening of the 13th of November, proceeded on board the schooners, and on the morning of the 14th, between seven and eight o'clock, anchored in the harbor of Foxardo. The first boat that left the Grampus was under charge of Lieutenant Pendergrast, accompanied by Lieutenant Barton, of the marine corps, with the marines of the Grampus, thirteen or fourteen in number. I do not know the orders that Mr. Pendergrast received. I saw him take possession of the battery before the rest of the boats had landed, without any opposition. About nine o'clock all the men had landed. We were formed in line on the beach. I received a message from Commodore Porter stating that he wished to see me. I repaired to the place where he was standing, and received orders from him to form my guard—look for the road to the town; proceed and take up a favorable position to cover the advance of the main body. I found the road without difficulty; marched my guard off, consisting of two sergeants, two corporals and twenty privates. I had also with me from the ship, a boy who is the marine drummer; a master at arms of the John Adams, and a drummer from the Grampus; the whole, including myself, amounting to twenty-eight persons. At the distance of about half a mile from the beach, there were two long nine-pounders mounted on a platform in the middle of the road. I halted the men to examine whether they were charged or not, and found they were not. I at the same time took off the aprons and threw them on the ground, after which I continued my march towards the town. When about half way between the beach and the town, I observed a small number of persons following me with a white flag. Not conceiving that I was under the necessity of waiting for them, until I discovered Lieut. Stribling to be one of the persons accompanying the flag, I proceeded on the road. At this time I was within sight of the town, approaching a position where I had contemplated halting to await his arrival. I halted upon that ground until he came up, and in reply to some observations from him, I told him I would escort him into the place; he replied very well. I suffered him to get in advance of me twenty or thirty yards, when I put the men in motion and followed him at a slow pace. I observed some movements among the Spaniards which I thought indicated hostility on their part. When Lieut. Stribling came up with me, there was a white flag held by the Spaniards at the entrance of the town.

They came out to meet him. I was at the time marching on slowly in his rear, when the flags met; I saw three or four Spaniards kneel and present their muskets. I had determined to push on at quick step and render him assistance, if it was necessary. I however received a message from him requesting me to halt, until his return from the town. At this time I was from one hundred and fifty to three hundred yards of the town. Commodore Porter arrived shortly after Lieut. Stribling left me to go into the town, and halted some distance in the rear of the marines. He came to the ground I occupied, and directed me to place my men in a position to face the Spaniards, which I did.

Not being able to complete the examination of Lieutenant Crabbe, the court adjourned till to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

TUESDAY, July 12.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court, (except Captain Wadsworth, who still continues too much indisposed to attend,) the judge advocate, and Captain Porter.

The minutes of the proceedings of yesterday were read. The examination of Lieutenant Crabbe was resumed:

A short time after Lieut. Stribling was observed returning, accompanied by the alcalde, and some other persons from the place, I was directed by Commodore Porter to occupy a position, on both sides of the road, and to suffer none to pass, excepting those who were in immediate attendance on the flag. Those instructions were obeyed. The commodore returned to where the officers were assembled, and there received the alcalde. I do not know what occurred there, being at too great a distance to hear what was said. After a short conversation between the commodore and the alcalde, I observed them approaching me. The commodore, as he passed, directed me to follow him, with the marines, to the town; stating, at the time, that he had received an invitation for himself, his officers, and men, to partake of some refreshments, after their march. We entered the outskirts of the place; I then had an opportunity of seeing the number of Spaniards drawn up, which amounted to about three times the number of the marine guard. They appeared to be militia, and with muskets. There was also another party on horseback, armed with swords, and a small number with a field piece, which I presumed to be a six-pounder. After some conversation between the commodore and the alcalde, the former stated, that if refreshments were sent to the beach, they should be paid for; at the same time stating to me, that he did not wish to bring all the men into the place, as he was afraid some excesses might be committed, which would put an end to the peaceable settlement of the business. Commodore Porter then parted with the alcalde, as I thought, upon friendly terms, left the place, accompanied by his officers, and returned to the beach. I omitted to mention, that, when I first received my instructions from Commodore Porter, I had particular orders not to suffer my men to commit any outrages upon the property of the inhabitants along the road; nor to commit any acts of hostility myself, unless I met with resistance.

On our return to the beach, I brought up the rear with the marines; we received the refreshments, after which we embarked, and went on board the schooners, and proceeded to the John Adams.

A number of the inhabitants accompanied us to the beach. The persons who brought the refreshments refused to receive payment for them.

Lieutenant Ritchie produced again by Captain Porter:

Question. Did Mr. Campos give any reason for advising Lieutenant Platt and you to go to Naguaba in search of the goods; such as its being a noted piratical establishment, &c.?

Answer. He said it had been noted as a place of deposit for stolen goods, and that he had once before found goods there which had been stolen.

Ques. (By same.) Are you acquainted with the situation of Naguaba and Boca del Inferno, on the coast of Porto Rico; and how far are they respectively from Foxardo and Ponce?

Ans. Naguaba is about twenty miles from Foxardo, and Boca del Inferno about fifteen miles from Ponce, between Naguaba and Ponce.

Ques. (By same.) Were those places, Boca del Inferno and Naguaba, also notorious as piratical haunts?

Ans. Both.

Thomas B. Barton, a lieutenant in the marine corps of the United States, being sworn according to law, deposes and says:

I was on board the Grampus, as passenger, for Thompson's Island. On the 14th November last, about 8 o'clock in the morning, the Grampus and Beagle, with the boats of the Adams, entered the harbor of Foxardo. The Grampus came to anchor opposite a two-gun battery, at which time I could plainly perceive fifteen or twenty persons at the battery, loading the guns and training them towards the Grampus. I immediately after received orders to proceed in the launch with Lieutenant Prendergast, first [lieutenant] of the Grampus, with fourteen marines, the guard of the Grampus; Lieutenant Prendergrast received orders from Commodore Porter to proceed in the direction of the two-gun battery, with as little hazard as possible, and take the fort, spike the guns, and destroy the ammunition. We pulled off from the Grampus, from half-past 8 to 9 o'clock. The people in the fort were, at the time, endeavoring to get the guns of the first to bear upon the launch. The course of the boat was altered, which prevented them from bringing the guns to bear upon us. They motioned with their hands for us not to proceed. We succeeded in reaching the rear of the fort and landed; and then in reaching the fort, situated about 80 feet above the level of the ocean. Just at the edge of the fort we saw about three or four of the Spaniards; the rest had run.

We immediately spiked the guns, and destroyed the ammunition, consisting of one round shot, one charge of powder, and a canister of small grape, musket balls, and spikes. One gun was charged, the other about half loaded; it had powder and ball, but the canister was not in it—both of them primed, and each having a lighted match alongside.

Agreeably to our orders, we immediately proceeded down to the beach, followed the motions of Commodore Porter, who had first landed with the troops and sailors on the beach, near the road leading to the town of Foxardo. On our arrival on the beach, Commodore Porter ordered me to remain in the rear to protect the boats at the landing. I had from twenty to twenty-five men, including marines and sailors. I was particularly ordered not to suffer a single person under my command to commit depredations on persons or property. The troops under the commodore a short time after marched off on the road leading to the town of Foxardo. After an absence of from two to four hours the main body returned. After receiving some refreshments on the beach, we were ordered to re-embark for the Grampus and Beagle. While on our way to the vessels, I could discover eight or ten men in the fort endeavoring to draw the spikes out of the guns, but they could not succeed. We got on board, and proceeded immediately out of the harbor.

Question. At what time was Lieutenant Stribling dispatched with the flag of truce?

Answer. I do not know. I believe that when we landed on the beach, both he and Lieutenant Crabbe were on their way towards the town.

Ques. Were the Spaniards whom you saw in the battery armed?

Ans. They had no small arms, I believe.

Elnathan Judson, a surgeon in the navy of the United States, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

Question. (By Captain Porter.) Do you recollect a conversation between Mr. Platt and myself, when we first landed at the harbor of Foxardo, respecting the omission of Mr. Platt to bring Mr. Bedford on shore; and my reply to his apology for the omission, that we must first inquire for the goods, and, if found, we might send for Mr. Bedford to identify them, or anything to that effect?

Ans. I recollect a conversation to that effect.

Lieutenant Platt again called:

Question. (By Captain Porter.) Have you any recollection of asking the interpreter, in the presence of the alcalde and myself, whether the goods you first came in search of had been found, and what was his answer?

Answer. I recollect perfectly well asking the question. It was after the commodore had been invited up to the village. He told me he was not aware of any discovery having been made. I was at the time in company with the commodore, and within his hearing.

The court adjourned till 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

WEDNESDAY, July 13.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court, the judge advocate and Captain Porter.

The proceedings of yesterday were read. The judge advocate then read and submitted to the court the following documents:

Instructions to Commodore Porter, dated February 1, 1823, marked 4.

Commodore Porter to Secretary of the Navy, dated November 15, 1824, marked 5.

Lieut. Platt to Commodore Porter, dated November 11, 1824, marked 6.

Stephen Cabot to Commodore Porter, dated November 12, 1824, marked 7.

Bergeest and Wilhorn to Commodore Porter, dated November 11th, 1824, marked 8.

The judge advocate stated that he had no further evidence to lay before the court in support of the first charge and specification under it. Captain Porter, by his counsel, submitted to the court a certain paper, hereunto annexed, and marked I. Whereupon the court was cleared to deliberate upon the same.

After mature deliberation, the court determined that it would receive any communication from the counsel of Capt. Porter, in support of the exceptions he had taken to the second charge, and the specifications thereof; but that all communications must be submitted in writing. The court also wishes that the same be presented with as little delay as possible, and after receiving them the court will proceed to deliberate upon the same.

The court being opened, the foregoing resolution of the court was announced to the accused.

The counsel for the accused then applied for time till to-morrow morning; whereupon the court adjourned till to-morrow morning, at 10 o'clock.

THURSDAY, July 14.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court, the judge advocate, and Captain Porter.

The minutes of the proceedings of yesterday were read. Captain Porter handed to the court a letter from Mr. Jones, his counsel, stating that a severe indisposition would prevent him from attending before the court to-day. Capt. Porter requested the further indulgence of the court till to-morrow; whereupon the court adjourned till to-morrow morning, at 10 o'clock.

FRIDAY, July 15.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court, the judge advocate, and Captain Porter. The minutes of the proceedings of yesterday were read.

The counsel for Captain Porter then proceeded to state to the court the objections to the second charge and specifications thereof, which he stated had been drawn up with great haste, and while laboring under great indisposition, and would require to be fairly transcribed before the paper could be annexed to the record. This he promised to have done, and to transmit the paper to the judge advocate.

The court was cleared, and having come to the resolution that it could not act upon the paper read by the counsel before it was laid before the court, it would take no order on the subject until that was done; whereupon the court was opened, and adjourned till 12 o'clock to-morrow.

SATURDAY, July 16.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday, and at four o'clock the counsel for Captain Porter presented the paper which contained the objections read yesterday, and the court adjourned till 10 o'clock on Monday morning.

MONDAY, July 18.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of Saturday. Present: all the members, the judge advocate, and Captain Porter.

The minutes of the proceedings of Saturday were read. The paper submitted to the court on Saturday was read by the counsel for Captain Porter, and annexed to the record, and marked K 1. After hearing the same, the court was cleared, and it was determined that the court would receive the remarks which the judge advocate had been requested to prepare, with open doors, and would then proceed to deliberate upon the questions that had been raised.

The court being opened, and the foregoing resolution announced, the judge advocate proceeded to read his reply to the objections that had been urged on behalf of the accused, which was annexed to the record, and marked K 2. Whereupon the court was cleared, and after some time spent in deliberation, the court was opened, and the following resolution announced:

The counsel for Captain Porter, after pleading generally, not guilty, under protest, and reserving a right at any future stage of the trial to take exceptions to the form and validity of the charges and specifications, or any of them, has now excepted to the second charge and specifications thereof, insisting that the same are defective in form, and that the facts therein set forth do not constitute any military offence, of which a court-martial can take cognizance. It being a matter of doubt among some of the members of the court, and the judge advocate, whether a decision upon this question would necessarily involve a final decision of the case, and preclude the accused from proceeding, under the plea of not guilty, to offer any evidence in the case; and should the court decide that it can take cognizance of the charges, &c., it being highly desirable that the whole case should be fully investigated; the court is desirous of obtaining the opinion of the attorney general upon the following questions:

1st. Whether the second charge and the specifications thereof are drawn up with sufficient precision, and in legal form, and whether the facts therein set forth do allege offences cognizable before a court-martial?

2d. Whether the decisions of the court upon the exceptions taken necessarily preclude the court from calling upon the accused to plead absolutely to the said charge and specifications, and proceeding to trial thereon, or whether such decision will be final, notwithstanding any waiver by the judge advocate of such consequence? And that the same be transmitted to the Secretary of the Navy, with a request that he submit the same to the attorney general of the United States for his opinion thereon.

Commodore Porter having heard the order of the court, referring certain questions to the attorney general, would renew the application, suggested the other day by his counsel, to reply in writing to the answer of the judge advocate to his objections against the second charge and the specifications of the same, if the questions are to be submitted to the attorney general, accompanied by the arguments that have been submitted to this court on both sides of the question.

The court was cleared to deliberate upon the application, and after some time the court was opened and Captain Porter was informed that the court had decided not to receive any rejoinder.

The court thereupon adjourned till two o'clock to-morrow.

TUESDAY, July 19, 1825.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court, the judge advocate, and Captain Porter. The proceedings of yesterday were read.

The judge advocate stated to the court that he had communicated to the Secretary of the Navy the resolution of the court on yesterday, with the questions annexed to the same; and that he had just received from the Secretary of the Navy certain documents, which were read, annexed to the record, and marked L, M, and N.

After reading the same, Captain Porter stated to the court that, with a view of preventing any unnecessary trouble or difficulties, he would withdraw the exceptions that had been urged on his behalf to the second charge and specifications, which, with the permission of the court, should be done to-morrow, in writing, and that he would then state the considerations by which he was guided. To this proposition the court acceded. Whereupon the court adjourned till 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

WEDNESDAY, July 20, 1825.

The court met pursuant to adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court, the judge advocate, and Captain Porter. The proceedings of yesterday were read.

Captain Porter stated to the court that he, being very much indisposed, would ask permission of the court to read, by his counsel, the paper to which he had referred yesterday; to this the court acceded, and Mr. Jones, the counsel for Captain Porter, commenced reading the same.

While proceeding to read it, the judge advocate stated that he considered a part of the paper as objectionable, inasmuch as it was a comment upon the reply read by him to the exceptions which had been taken to the charge and specifications, and to which the court had already announced its determination to receive no rejoinder. Whereupon the court was cleared to deliberate upon the question: and after maturely examining and considering the paper submitted, the court is of opinion that all that part of the same commencing on the second page with the words "I beg leave further to state," and terminating at the bottom of the fourth page; and the passage commencing on the fifth page with the words "whether it may hereafter," and terminating at the end of the first paragraph on the sixth page, is objectionable, on the ground stated, and as not pertinent to any matter or question now before the court, for its consideration, and consequently cannot be received. Whereupon the court was opened and the foregoing proceedings read by the judge advocate. The counsel for Captain Porter then proceeded to read to the court the paper, as received by the court, which was annexed and marked O.

The judge advocate then read and submitted to the court the following documents referred to in the first specification of the second charge:

1st. Copy of a letter from Captain Porter to the President of the United States, dated March 17th, 1825, certified by the chief clerk of the Navy Department to be a true copy from the original, filed in that Department. The counsel for the accused objected to the production of the certified copy of the letter to the President, and required the production of the original, which, as he stated, appears to be in the Navy Department: he further stated that Captain Porter believed that a variance existed between the copy offered and the original, as to the date. The court was cleared, and after some time spent in deliberation was reopened, and the decision of the court was read, that the copy certified by the chief clerk of the Department was not admissible in evidence. Captain Porter then presented the following minute of explanation:

Captain Porter begs leave to explain, that his call for the originals, though founded on one of the most indispensable rules of evidence, which requires the best evidence the nature of the case admits, was not intended to stop the reading of the copies "de bene esse;" with an understanding and proviso that the originals, if extant, shall be produced; he observes some discrepancies between the copies offered and his own; and therefore wishes that exact accuracy shall be obtained by the production of the originals, which he understands can be done without any inconvenience, since they appear to be among the archives of the Navy Department.

The judge advocate then called upon Capt. Porter to produce a certain correspondence between himself and Mr. Monroe, late President of the United States, bearing date the 10th and 12th days of March, 1825, being two notes from Capt. Porter, of the aforesaid dates, to Mr. Monroe, and one note from Mr. Monroe, dated the 12th March, and such other note from Mr. Monroe, if any other there be, referred to in a letter from said Capt. David Porter to the Secretary of the Navy, dated April 13, 1825. He further stated that the counsel for Capt. Porter, and Capt. Porter himself, had been notified on the 8th July, instant, to produce the aforesaid papers on the trial of this case.

To this application, Capt. Porter made the following answer:

In answer to the call made by the judge advocate for the production of a certain correspondence between Capt. Porter and Mr. Monroe, late President of the United States, dated on the 10th and 12th days of March last, being two notes from Capt. Porter of the aforesaid dates to Mr. Monroe, and one from Mr. Monroe, dated on the 12th, he remarks, from the reference to dates, after Mr. Monroe had ceased to be President of the United States, that a correspondence, merely private and unofficial, is what this call purports to have designated. He conceived the specifications vague and uncertain enough, when it accused him of the writing of insubordinate and disrespectful letters, of which neither the identity nor the exceptional passages were pointed out, otherwise than by a naked reference to dates; but now, letters to which not one of the specifications purport to bear the remotest reference, are called for. Capt. Porter, in answer to this call, has only to say that it is incumbent on the judge advocate, in the first instance, to show the relevancy of this correspondence to the matter in issue, which of course will include the kindred question. By what right is the private and unofficial correspondence of the accused to be subjected to this inquisitorial power? Is he to be compelled to disclose his private correspondence, merely to have it examined to see whether it contains any criminating matter? And if it should be subjected to this inquisitorial power, and should appear to have been so offensive in its language, is it to be contended that he could be called to account before this court for any offence that could be taken at an unpublished correspondence? But he has this only to remark, in conclusion, that as Mr. Monroe is a party to the alleged correspondence, is the depository of a part or the whole of it, and of course is entitled to all the inviolate sanctions of a private correspondence; when he shall give up his part of it to the prosecution, or when it shall be authentically certified to Capt. Porter that Mr. Monroe desires the disclosure of it, then it will be time enough to call upon Capt. Porter to decide on the expediency of surrendering such parts of the correspondence as may be in his hands; but he reverts to the original question, and demands from the judge advocate an explanation, under what specification and for what purpose this newly designated correspondence, prima facie, so foreign to anything in the matter of the accusation, is to be offered in evidence?

The judge advocate then called upon the court for permission to issue interrogatories, to take the deposition of Mr. Monroe. The court was cleared to consider this question, and it determined that the deposition of Mr. Monroe may be taken upon interrogatories Whereupon the judge advocate was directed to prepare his interrogatories, and to submit the same to the accused, who shall be at liberty to file cross interrogatories if done without delay, and that the same be transmitted to the witness with a request that he answer the same, and swear to such answers before any judge, magistrate, or notary public, and that the same be deemed a sufficient authentication of such evidence. Whereupon, the court was opened and this decision announced.

Capt. Porter having heard the order read, directing the deposition of Mr. Monroe to be taken on interrogatories, as well on the part of the judge advocate as of the accused, suggests that, (before he can frame any interrogatories on his part, directly pointing to the gist of the accusation, which the correspondence before alluded to, between himself and Mr. Monroe, or the deposition of the latter, may be cited to support,) it will be necessary for the requisition upon the judge advocate, contained in Capt. Porter's answer to the call for the said correspondence, to be complied with; namely, to declare, specifically, the purpose and object of offering the said correspondence in evidence, and the particular point of the accusation to which it is supposed to relate. Capt. Porter begs leave further to suggest, that the interrogatories to be exhibited to Mr. Monroe, on the part of the prosecution, will probably only go to the authentication of the supposed correspondence, which can of course afford no clue to divine the purpose, or the gist of the accusation, for which the correspondence is wanted.

The judge advocate inquired whether the foregoing was designed as an application to the court; to which the counsel of Captain Porter replied, that it was an application to him. The judge advocate then remarked that he must answer in the negative, and decline going into any specification. It was then said by the counsel for the accused, it would be deemed an application to the court.

The court was cleared to deliberate upon the application on the part of the accused, and when it was opened, it was announced that the application is not complied with.

The court then adjourned till 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

THURSDAY, July 21.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court, the judge advocate, and Captain Porter.

The proceedings of yesterday were read. The judge advocate then proceeded to read, (it being admitted that the original is in the handwriting of Captain Porter,) the original letter from Captain Porter to the President of the United States, and it appearing that the same corresponded with the certified copy which was offered yesterday, with the exception that the word President was written at full length in the one, and Prest. in the other; that Mr. Randall's name was, in the original, spelled with one l, and with two in the copy; and the date of the original was April 17th, 1825, and that of the copy, 17 April, 1825. The variations were corrected, and the copy annexed to the record, and marked 5. The judge advocate stated that he had left the documents, which it was designed to exhibit in evidence, at the Navy Department, with a request that they might be particularly compared with the originals, and that they should be brought down by a witness, prepared to swear to their accuracy.

The judge advocate further stated that, at the opening of the court this morning, he had submitted to the counsel for the accused the interrogatories to be propounded to Mr. Monroe, for the purpose of having the cross-interrogatories annexed thereto, and that it was important to have the same completed, that they might be transmitted without delay; the counsel for the accused replied that he had been unable to complete the same, but would have it done by the opening of the court in the morning.

Captain Porter then submitted to the court the following paper:

Captain Porter having been this day, after the meeting of the court, served by the judge advocate with a copy of his interrogatories to Mr. Monroe, to which he perceives is annexed the original correspondence, alluded to in the call made upon Captain Porter by the judge advocate yesterday; that is, the original letters of Captain Porter, of the 10th and 12th of March last, and the rough draught of Mr. Monroe's answer, of the 12th, which dispenses Captain Porter from any delicacy in saying that he admits the authenticity of the said letter; but being still uninformed of the purpose intended by the introduction of the same, reserves all proper objections to the relevancy and admission of the same as evidence, when the same shall be offered as such evidence.

The court having continued in session until near three o'clock, and no witness having appeared, the court adjourned till ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

FRIDAY, July 22.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court, the judge advocate and Captain Porter. The proceedings of yesterday were read.

John Boyle, a witness, being called, and duly sworn, according to law, deposes and says:

Qu stion. Are you a clerk in the Navy Department?

Answer. I am.

Ques. Have you carefully compared the papers now shown you with the originals on file in that Department, and are they exact copies?

Ans. I assisted in the examination of the papers; all those from Commodore Porter were compared with the originals; those to him were compared with the records in the Department. The originals of these letters were transmitted to Captain Porter. I believe them to be true copies.

The judge advocate then proceeded to read the following documents:

1st. The residue of the letters referred to in the first specification of the second charge, marked 6, 7, 8, 9.

2d. The pamphlet referred to in the second specification, (No. 11,) with the letters transmitting the same to the Secretary of the Navy, (10,) the publication of the pamphlet being admitted, the accused submitted to the court his cross-interrogatories, accompanied by a protest. The judge advocate stated to the court that an assertion was contained in that protest, in the following words: "Having repeatedly called upon the judge advocate for some precise specification of the circumstances wherein the supposed guilt, implied by the accusation under the head of the second charge, consists;" that this assertion contains the first intimation he has ever received of such application. He wished, also, the opinion of the court, whether the protest should be transmitted to Mr. Monroe with the interrogatories. The court was cleared, and when it was opened, the opinion of the court was announced, that such protest was not proper to transmit to the witness, but that the same may be annexed to the record, which was accordingly done, and marked 12.

The reading of the pamphlet continued until half after three o'clock, when the court adjourned till ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

SATURDAY, July 23.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court, the judge advocate and Captain Porter.

The proceedings of yesterday were read.

The judge advocate stated that the interrogatories and cross-interrogatories, submitted yesterday, had been put in the way of going to Mr. Monroe, without delay, accompanied by a letter urging his immediate reply, and pointing out the mode in which the deposition should be authenticated, which letter had been previously submitted to the accused and his counsel.

The reading of the pamphlet was continued and concluded.

The judge advocate then proceeded to point out the particulars in which the statement of the proceedings of the court of inquiry was deemed incorrect; and submitted a copy of the original record of the proceedings of the court of inquiry, which was compared with the original record in the presence of the court—annexed and marked No. 13. The judge advocate stated that he would particularly state such variance in writing.

The judge advocate then submitted to the court the National Journal, of June 16th, 1825, containing a publication which Captain Porter admitted to be his, under date of June 15th, 1825, annexed and marked No. 14.

The court then adjourned until ten o'clock on Monday morning.

MONDAY, July 25, 1825.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of Saturday. Present: all the members of the court, the judge advocate, and Capt. Porter. The proceedings of Saturday were read. The judge advocate stated that he had received no answer from Mr. Monroe, but expected to have it in the course of the day. The judge advocate proceeded to read his note of all the variances which he had discovered between the original record and the proceedings of the court of inquiry as published by Capt. Porter, which was annexed and marked 15. A paper was read by the judge advocate, containing a statement of certain facts, agreed to by both sides, dispensing with the attendance of witnesses to establish them, which was also annexed and marked 16.

William W. Seaton, Esq., being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

Question. Are you one of the editors of the National Intelligencer?

Answer. Yes.

Ques. Is the paper now shown you, of March 30th, 1825, one of the numbers of that paper from your office?

Ans. Yes.

Ques. From whom were the official documents therein printed procured, purporting to be from the Secretary of the Navy to Commodore Porter, and from Commodore Porter to the Secretary of the Navy, being four in number?

Ans. The shortest and most acceptable way of answering the question will be to read a correspondence between the Secretary of the Navy and ourselves upon this subject, which will show what answer I am prepared and willing to give.

[The court was cleared, and decided that it would accede to the request of the witness, and hear the letters read to which he had referred, and being opened, this decision was announced.]

The letters referred to were then read, annexed, and marked 17, 18, and 19.

I am not willing for the reasons stated in the letters read, to give any other answer than that which we gave to the Secretary of the Navy. The president of the court having directed the court to be cleared, the accused by his counsel, stated that perhaps the difficulty might be obviated, and read and submitted to the court the following paper:

Captain Porter, having heard the evidence of Mr. Seaton, and the correspondence between Messrs. Gales and Seaton and the Secretary of the Navy, as to the author of the publication of a certain correspondence between the Secretary of the Navy and Captain Porter, in the National Intelligencer of the 30th March last, and perceiving that the witness, as editor of a public journal, has claimed a privilege, as well before this court, as in his correspondence with the Secretary of the Navy, to withhold the name of the author of any publication, not impeached of falsehood, and that the court is about to deliberate upon the objection of the witness to disclose the author of the publication in question; Captain Porter has no hesitation to admit now, as he would have avowed to the Secretary of the Navy, if he had pleased to have directed his inquiries to Captain Porter, instead of the printers, that he did communicate and caused to be published, in the Intelligencer of the 30th March last, the correspondence between himself and the Secretary of the Navy, which that paper purports to contain.

The judge advocate then submitted to the court the National Intelligencer, of March 30th, 1825, containing certain correspondence between the Secretary of the Navy and Captain Porter, annexed and marked 20.

Peter Force, a witness, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

Question. Are you the editor of the National Journal?

Answer. Yes.

Ques. Look at a communication in your paper of June 16th, 1825. From whom did you receive that and when?

Ans. I received the note and the accompanying documents from Commodore Porter, on the day of the date of it, June 15th, 1825.

Ques. Did any, and what conversation take place between yourself and Commodore Porter, in relation to the letter dated June 14th, 1825?

Ans. (Commodore Porter having, on a suggestion of the witness, absolved him from all obligation of secrecy,) I read the letter in presence of Commodore Porter, and perceiving that, as I understood it, Commodore Porter attributed an anonymous communication which had appeared in the Journal of the 13th to the Secretary of the Navy, I informed Commodore Porter that it was not from the Secretary of the Navy, and also told him I was authorized by the author of the communication to inform him by whom it was written, when properly requested so to do. He replied by declining to hear by whom it was written. This took place on the 15th of June, when I received the communication, the day before it was published in the newspaper. At the same time, I mentioned to Commodore Porter that the anonymous communication was not by the Secretary of the Navy, he remarked, I think, the similarity of the language in the letter from him of the 13th June (one of those in that communication) with the anonymous note published in the Journal was sufficient to warrant the opinion he had formed.

Cross-examined on the part of the accused:

Question. When you remarked, in reference to my letter to the Secretary of the Navy of the 14th June, that I was mistaken in supposing that the Secretary was the author of the anonymous note referred to, did I not point out to you the striking resemblance and correspondence between the date and the language of that note and the Secretary's letter of the 13th June?

Answer. I am under the impression that Commodore Porter referred to it, but cannot recollect whether he pointed it out.

Ques. Did you not express yourself as struck with these resemblances, in so much that if you had not known the real author of the anonymous note, you might have drawn the same conclusion?

Ans. No, I think I expressed no opinion of the kind; I think I observed there was a resemblance.

Ques. Did I not remark to you that, whether the Secretary did or did not actually write or communicate the anonymous note, circumstances justified me in concluding, at the time I wrote my letter of the 14th June, that the note had come from an official source, and had been approved or countenanced by him?

Ans. I think Commodore Porter did make such a remark in substance.

The judge advocate stated that he had now submitted to the court all the testimony which he proposed laying before it at the present state of the proceedings, with the exception of Mr. Monroe's deposition. Captain Porter intimated his readiness to proceed with the evidence on his part.

John Simpson, a witness, produced on behalf of the accused, deposes and says:

Question. (By the accused.) Were you employed by me, during the sitting of the late court of inquiry in my case, to copy, from the judge advocate's record, the proceedings of the court, for my use?

Answer. I was.

Ques. Were you furnished, by the judge advocate, with his minutes of the proceedings, for the purpose of being copied for me?

Ans. I was.

Ques. Were the copies which you did make of those minutes made carefully and accurately, and word for word with the original as it then stood, except the statement given in the first day's proceedings of what I said in answer to the question whether I had any objection to offer against either of the members of the court?

Ans. The copy I made was a true copy.

Ques. Were you present on the first day of the court, when I stated my objection, and did you take particular notice of my words, and accurately recollect them?

Ans. I do not now recollect them. I took particular notice, and recollected them for some days after.

Ques. Examine the two statements of the terms of my said objection. First, as it appears at page 5 of the copy of the original record now shown you; and, secondly, as corrected at page 22 of the same document; and say, according to the best of your recollection now, and when the subject was newer and fresher in your memory, which of these is the true statement of the terms in which I originally submitted that objection?

[The witness is here shown the copy of the original record, produced in evidence by the judge advocate on Saturday, and those passages of the same wherein the original minutes of Captain Porter's objection is entered, in the proceedings of Monday, May 2d, and corrected in those of the Thursday following, are designated, for the examination of the witness.]

Ans. I have a recollection of this. The last is the correct one.

Ques. Examine the nine sheets of paper now shown you, and say whether they be the original manuscript, in your own handwriting, of the copy which you took, as you have before stated, from the minutes furnished you by the judge advocate?

Ans. They are the original manuscript of my copy, and are an exact copy of the notes furnished me by the judge advocate. (They extend as far as the end of the first paragraph on page 27 of the pamphlet.)

Cross-examined by the judge advocate:

Question. Can you say that no error or omission was, by accident, made by you, in your copying?

Answer. I believe there was not any.

Ques. Was the copy compared with the original, and with whose assistance?

Ans. I read it over myself.

Ques. Look at page 23 of the pamphlet, and see whether the words "holds the highest commission which" were not omitted by you in copying?

Ans. I do not think I omitted anything in copying.

Ques. Look at the paper handed you, and see if it be the original paper from which you took that part of your copy?

[The judge advocate here exhibited to the witness his original note of this part of the proceedings of the court of inquiry.]

Ans. I cannot be positive.

Ques. Were the papers submitted to the court of inquiry by Capt. Porter, in your handwriting, exact copies of the original?

Ans. They were.

Ques. Did you copy the latter part of the paper marked B; I mean the copy from which the pamphlet was published?

Ans. I think I copied it; I am not certain.

Ques. Was the copy furnished Capt. Porter, of that paper, an exact transcript of the original?

Ans. Yes.

Ques. Did Captain Porter, to your knowledge, ever compare or assist in comparing your copy with the original from which it was taken?

Ans. No.

Ques. Do you know whether the original notes were read to the court of inquiry, as the record of its proceedings, or a fair transcript of the same?

Ans. I do not think the original notes were.

Ques. Do you know whether the record read, was ever rectified publicly, as, for instance, at the request of a witness.

Ans. I do not.

Ques. Was not a letter in your handwriting, transmitted to the court of inquiry, found to be dated March 6th, instead of May 6th, by your mistake?

Ans. Yes.

Ques. Have you any more confidence in the accuracy of the copies which you have now sworn to, than you had in that before the error was pointed out?

Ans. I have more confidence.

Ques. Did you conceive it possible that any inaccuracy had been committed on that occasion by you in copying that letter, before Captain Porter informed you of the mistake in date; and did you not request to see the paper in your own handwriting, before you would believe that it could have been made?

Ans. I did not know that I had committed the mistake until I saw it.

Re-examined by Captain Porter:

Question. Did I frequently enjoin upon you, whilst engaged in copying the minutes of the court of inquiry, to be very particular and accurate; and did you take particular pains to be so?

Answer. I did take particular pains to be so. Captain Porter saw I was very particular, and I do not know that he made any such request of me.

Ques. (By a member of the court.) Are you much in the habit of copying from MS.; and were the notes written in a fair, legible hand?

Ans. I have copied a good deal, and the notes from which I copied were fair and legible.

Ques. (Captain Porter.) Look at the sheet of paper now shown you, and say whether it be the same or like the handwriting of the minutes from which you copied?

Ans. I think all I copied was in that handwriting; some came after, which I did not copy, in a different hand.

It is admitted that the paper shown was in the handwriting of Mr. Harrison, in whose hand, also, the original part of the original record is.

Ques. Was your transcript of my letter, in which the mistake of the date occurred, as above mentioned, taken from my rough draught; and are my rough draughts generally written in a fair hand, or in a very hurried, rough way?

Ans. I do not recollect particularly; it was very easily read. I read Commodore Porter's rough draughts very easily I was Captain Porter's clerk about fifteen months.

The court adjourned till ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

TUESDAY, July 26.

The court met pursuant to adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court, the judge advocate, and Captain Porter. The proceedings of yesterday were read.

John T. Ritchie, a lieutenant in the navy of the United States, a witness produced on the part of the accused, being duly sworn according to law, and examined by Captain Porter, deposes and says:

Question. Examine the four sheets of paper now shown you, and say in whose handwriting the same are.

[The witness is here shown the manuscript copy from which was printed what is contained in the pamphlet given in evidence, under the second and third and fourth specifications of the second charge, from where the manuscript copy, proved by John Simpson yesterday, ended on page twenty-seven, to the end of the paragraph ending with the words "at 11 o'clock," on page thirty-two of the same pamphlet.]

Answer. The first three are in the handwriting of Mr. Sarazau; the last sheet is in the handwriting of Mrs. Simpson, wife of Mr. John Simpson, with the exception of a few words in the latter part of it, (of which I have no knowledge;)—the word which, in the fourth line from the bottom, and the word being, in the third line from the bottom; these words are in the handwriting of Captain Porter.

Ques. What was the character, and in whose handwriting was the original from which those sheets were copied?

Ans. They were part of the proceedings of the court of inquiry, and in the handwriting of the judge advocate.

Ques. Did you carefully and accurately compare these four sheets with such originals, and are they exact copies? Please state the manner in which you compared the copy and the originals, and whether you are certain of the accuracy of the copy.

Ans. I think I read them over, the first three sheets two several times. First I read the copy with another person, (my wife,) who was looking over the original, and afterwards read over the original, she having the copy. I discovered no error throughout. The last sheets I examined in the same manner, with Mrs. Simpson.

Ques. What has become of Mr. Sarazau; has he left this part of the country?

Ans. I believe he is in the city of Washington, but I have not seen him myself since soon after this thing occurred. Philadelphia is his home, and he may possibly have gone there.

Cross-examined on the part of the judge advocate:

Question. Do you know whether Captain Porter ever saw the original papers, from which the copy was taken?

Asswer. I do not.

Ques. Would you now recognize any one of these papers as such original?

Ans. I think not.

The judge advocate then read a sentence from what he stated to be the original minute, furnished after the proceedings of Monday, May 9th, and exhibited the paper to the witness.

Question. Can you not recollect this paper to have been the paper from which the proceedings of that day were copied, from the sealing wax dropped on it; and is the second paragraph in the one an exact copy of the other?

Answer. I cannot identify the paper; on a comparison there appears an entire line omitted.

Martin King, a witness produced on the part of the accused, being duly sworn according to law, and by him interrogated, deposes as follows:

Question. Were you at the time of the printing and publishing my pamphlet, (now shown you,) and are you still, foreman in the printing office of Davis & Force, where that pamphlet was printed?

[The witness is here shown the pamphlet formerly given in evidence by the judge advocate.]

Answer. I was then and am now.

Ques. Examine the thirteen sheets of paper, writing now shown you, and say whether they be the identical copy from which that pamphlet, or so much of it as is composed of that copy, was printed?

[The witness is here shown the same nine sheets of copy mentioned in the evidence of John Simpson, and the four sheets mentioned in the evidence of Lieutenant John T. Ritchie.]

Ans. I believe them to be the same.

Ques. Were the proof sheets of the pamphlet diligently and carefully compared with the copy, and every typographical error that was detected, carefully corrected; and was this comparison made both by the proof reader in the printing office, and by myself?

Ans. They were; I read them over twice, and Captain Porter read them over once.

Ques. (By the judge advocate.) Was all the copy from which that pamphlet was published, with the note-marks to the different documents therein contained, communicated by Captain Porter for the purpose of printing that pamphlet, and was he satisfied with its accuracy?

Ans. No complaints were made by him of any want of accuracy. I saw one or two noticed in the public prints, such as clothes for colors, and perhaps one or two others of the same kind.

The accused then submitted to the court a letter from R. S. Coxe, the judge advocate, dated May 21st, which was read, annexed to the record and marked 21.

The judge advocate stated t at he wished it to appear on the record to what application that letter was an answer, and that he was desirous of exhibiting before the court the same statement in regard to it which he had before submitted to Captain Porter, annexed and marked 22.

William W. Seaton, called by the accused. A question was proposed to Mr. Seaton on the part of Captain Porter. The judge advocate stated that he felt great reluctance to interpose any difficulty in the way of any investigation which the accused might deem it important to pursue; but that the question now stated, and the inquiry designed to be made, appeared to him so wholly foreign to the inquiry in which the court was engaged, that he felt it incumbent upon him to take the opinion of the court upon the subject. The object of the accused had been communicated to him, but he wished it to be submitted in writing to the court, to enable it to decide upon the point with accuracy. The reasons having been stated, the court was cleared, and after having maturely considered the same, the court is of opinion that the question be put; which decision was accordingly announced.

Mr. Seaton was then called.

Question. (By Capt. Porter.) Look upon the third paragraph of the third page of the National Intelligencer, under date of May 5th, 1825, in the words, "We are informed that we did not exactly understand, and of course did not accurately state, the ground on which the exception taken by Commodore Porter to the court of inquiry, now sitting in this city, was overruled by the Secretary of the Navy. The letter of the Secretary to the court stated that, as far as the Secretary could be called upon for an opinion on that question, Commodore Porter ought to have made his application to him at an earlier day, but that the opinion of the Department, as to the legality of the manner in which the court was composed, had been expressed in the very act which created and convened the court, and that nothing was discovered in the argument of Commodore Porter to change the opinion. The act of the Department was placed, therefore, on the ground of its legality, by the Secretary, and not on the ground of time in taking the exception, that circumstance being incidentally introduced into his letter. Our information was obtained in current conversation, and was inaccurate only from not being as fully stated as it might have been," and say by whose request that paragraph was published, and by whom it was communicated, in terms or in substance?

Answer. I cannot answer the question with propriety. If it be not absolutely essential for the purposes of justice, I should prefer, for the reasons stated yesterday, not to give any other answer. I have an additional reason in this case for declining, because the communication was expressly a private and confidential one.

The court was cleared to deliberate upon the course to be pursued.

Upon the opening of the court, it was announced that the court is of opinion that although, from a wish to afford every facility to the accused, in pursuing any investigation which he may deem important, it did permit the question proposed to be propounded, and would have permitted the witness to answer it, yet, when the court is called upon to determine whether it will exercise the power which the law confers of coercing the witness to answer, the question assumes a more serious aspect; and the court, after mature consideration, is of opinion that the question proposed is one which cannot in any material degree affect the case of the accused, and therefore will not compel the witness to reply to it.

The counsel for the accused then prepared and presented another question, which the judge advocate stated was liable to the same objection as before. The court was cleared to determine whether or not it should be propounded to the witness. The question is as follows:

Ques. Did the paragraph in question proceed directly or indirectly from the Secretary of the Navy; and what agency had he, if any, in preparing it for the press, and causing its publication?

After having deliberated upon the same, the court determined that the question should not be put.

The court adjourned till ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

WEDNESDAY, July 27, 1825.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court, the judge advocate, and Captain Porter. The minutes of the proceedings of yesterday were read.

The counsel for the accused proposed reading a paper to the court; the president of the court announced to him that the opinion of the court yesterday was that all communications be submitted to it through the judge advocate.

The counsel declining to pursue that course, the court was cleared, and when it was opened it was announced that the court had decided that the following rule of practice be adopted:

The accused may submit his communications in writing to the court; the same shall then be publicly read by the judge advocate, the court reserving the right of admitting and receiving the papers, or any part thereof.

The counsel for the accused then submitted a petition to the court, calling upon the court to have the Secretary of the Navy summoned to attend as a witness, or that interrogatories be transmitted to him, stating his reasons for the same. The judge advocate observed that the uniform practice had been, both in this case and others, for the accused to hand him the names of such witnesses as he wished to be officially summoned; that such request had been uniformly and promptly complied with. That no application had been made to him for such summons for the Secretary of the Navy; had it been, it should have been afforded the accused without hesitation; and if now made, should be granted at this time.

The court was cleared, and when it was opened it was announced that the paper will not be received, and the judge advocate is directed to return the same to the accused, which was accordingly done.

The judge advocate received a letter from Mr. Seaton, with a request that the same be laid before the court, which was accordingly done, annexed, and marked 22.

The counsel for the accused stated that he had nothing to submit to the court at this time.

Gustavus Harrison, a witness produced by the judge advocate, being duly sworn according to law, and by him examined, deposed as follows:

Question. Were you employed by me, during the sitting of the court of inquiry, in the case of Captain D. Porter, to copy the proceedings of the court from my minutes?

Answer. Yes.

Ques. Look at the original record now shown you, and say whether you copied the proceedings of the said court, excepting those of the last day.

Ans. It is all in my handwriting, with the exception of some corrections and the proceedings of the last day.

Ques. At what time were you furnished with the minutes from which you took the copy; when did you return me your copy, and when were those corrections made?

Ans. I generally received them about four or five o'clock in the afternoon, after the adjournment of the court; I copied them and returned them the next morning, before the meeting of the court; we then examined them, and the corrections were made.

Ques. From the time the copy was made by you until after those corrections were made, was it in the power of any one to have taken a copy from either of those papers, and do you believe any such copy was at any time taken?

Ans. I am positive that it was not.

The accused not being prepared to cross-examine the witness at this time, the court adjourned till ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

THURSDAY, July 28.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court, the judge advocate, and Captain Porter. The minutes of the proceedings of yesterday were read.

Mr. Harrison, being again called by the accused, was by him interrogated as follows:

Question. Examine the several interlineations and erasures in the record proved by you yesterday as your transcript from the original minutes of the judge advocate, at pages 7, 8, 21, 25, 26, 31, 32, 38, 40, the adjournment at page 38, and the note at the bottom of the page 41, and say by whom they appear to have been made?

Answer. The interlineations appear to be in the handwriting of Mr. Coxe; I cannot say whether the erasures were made by him or by myself; the adjournment at p. 38 is in my own handwriting; the note at p. 41, is in the handwriting of Mr. Coxe, the 7 in page 41 is, I believe, Mr. Coxe's.

Ques. Can you recollect, with certainty, whether the original minutes, when given to you to copy, had in them the words and passages which now appear interlined, erased and added, at the pages above mentioned of the said transcript?

Ans. I do not know that I can with certainty.

Ques. From your recollection of the general accuracy or inaccuracy of your transcript, as originally made, can you say that you made the mistakes which these alterations, now appearing on the face of the transcript, indicate?

Ans. I cannot say that I made all of them; I know that I made a considerable number.

Ques. Refer more particularly to the interlineation at p. 7, and the note at the bottom of p. 41, and say whether you have any recollection of having made those mistakes?

Ans. I cannot say whether or not it was my omission.

Ques. When did you first see that part of the record, giving the last day's proceedings, stated as in the handwriting of the judge advocate; and do you know anything of the penciled interlineation in the second paragraph of the same?

Ans. I do not recollect seeing that part of the proceedings, until it was shown me yesterday, and I know nothing of that interlineation; all that I recollect is that when I called, as usual, for the proceedings of that day, I was informed, by Mr. Coxe, that it was copied by him for the purpose of being transmitted to the Department, or words to that effect; I do not think I saw the proceedings of that day, at all, until I saw it yesterday.

Questioned by the judge advocate:

Question. Have you any recollection of my making, on one or more occasions, so many corrections in your transcript that you proposed taking it back with you to make a fair copy, and what passed on that occasion?

Answer. I do recollect there were so many corrections in one day's work, as to induce me to ask to re-copy it. Your reply was, that there was not then time; that you had to carry them out with you to the court, to read them as the proceedings of the court.

On the part of the accused:

Ques. Did you ever make more than one copy of the record?

Ans. I have no recollection that I ever did; I think I may have made other copies of papers exhibited by Commodore Porter, but I think I never did for the record.

Ques. Look at the sheet now shown you, and say if it be in your handwriting; at what time you copied; whether before or after you made the transcript for the judge advocate; and from what paper—the original or your transcript—did you copy it?

[The witness is here shown a loose sheet, purporting to be a copy of so much of the record as begins with the words "the room was cleared," on page 21, and ends with the words "10 o'clock to-morrow morning," on page 24.]

Ans. The paper is in my handwriting, and I have a perfect recollection of the circumstances under which I copied it. When I gave the answer I did just now, I thought the paper I had made two copies of was an original paper submitted by Commodore Porter; I now find it was an answer to one of his papers; I copied this before copying the record from the minutes of the judge advocate, for the use, as I understood, of Commodore Porter, by the direction of Mr. Coxe, and it was, I believe, the only paper I copied in his office.

The judge advocate stated then that if there was nothing further ready on the part of the accused, he should now offer the deposition of Mr. Monroe, in answer to the interrogatories heretofore sent to him.

The accused desiring to see the papers which it was proposed to submit to the court, the same were handed to him by the judge advocate, and after being perused, were returned.

They were accordingly (no objection having been made,) read, and submitted to the court, as follows:

1. The letter from Mr. Monroe to the judge advocate, dated July 25th, 1825. (23.)
2. The interrogatories, cross interrogatories, and answers thereto, sworn to before Mr. J. Bailey, a magistrate in Loudon county, Virginia, July 25th, 1825, marked (24,) (25.)
3. The copy of a note from Captain Porter to Mr. Monroe, dated May 10th, 1825. (26.)
4. Copy of Mr. Monroe's answer, dated March 12th, 1825. (27.)
5. Captain Porter's reply dated March 12th, 1825. (28.)
6. Certified copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, dated 21st October, 1824, to Commodore Porter. (29.)

It was also agreed that the documents annexed to the original record, as given in evidence before the court of inquiry, and endorsed and numbered by Commodore Chauncey, the president of said court.

The court adjourned till ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

FRIDAY, July 29, 1825.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court, (excepting Captain Biddle,) the judge advocate and Captain Porter.

Captain Spence stated that Captain Biddle was prevented by sickness from attending to-day.

The minutes of the proceedings of yesterday were read. Capt. Porter stated to the court that Mr. Jones (his counsel) was engaged in the necessary arrangements and business of this case, and that he had nothing at this time to lay before the court; whereupon,

The court adjourned till ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

SATURDAY, July 30, 1825.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court, (excepting Captain Biddle,) the judge advocate, and Captain Porter.

The president announced to the court that, although Captain Biddle was much better than he was yesterday, he still continued too much indisposed to resume his seat.

The judge advocate then submitted and read to the court the following documents; some of which were presented at the request of Captain Porter, the residue by the judge advocate, to complete the chain of the correspondence:

1st. Copy of letter from Smith Thompson, Secretary of the Navy, to Commodore Porter, dated Navy Department, August 19, 1823. (30.)

2d. Copy of letter from Samuel L. Southard, Secretary of the Navy, to Commodore Porter, dated Navy Department, September 29, 1823. (31.)

3d. Extract of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, dated September 30, 1823. (32.)

4th. Copy of letter from I. Chauncey, acting Secretary of Navy, to Commodore Porter, dated Navy Department, October 28, 1823. (33.)

5th. Extract of letter from Commodore Porter to the Secretary of the Navy, dated November 19, 1823. (34.)

6th. Extract of instructions from Secretary of the Navy to Commodore Porter, dated December, 1823. (35.)

7th. Copy of letter from Samuel L. Southard, Secretary of the Navy, to Commodore Porter, dated Navy Department, May 17, 1824. (36.)

8th. Copy of letter from D. Porter to Secretary of the Navy, dated Sea Gull, Matanzas, May 28, 1824. (37.)

9th. Copy of letter from Samuel L. Southard, Secretary of the Navy, to Commodore Porter, dated Navy Department, May 31, 1824. (38.)

10th. Copy of letter from Commodore D. Porter to Secretary of the Navy, dated Washington, June 25, 1824. (39.)

11th. Copy of letter from Charles Hay, for Secretary of the Navy, to Commodore Porter, dated Navy Department, June 29, 1824. (40.)

12th. Copy of letter from Commodore Porter to the Secretary of the Navy, dated Washington, August 11, 1824. (41.)

13th. Extract of a letter from Charles Hay, (handed in by Commodore Porter,) to Commodore Porter, dated Georgetown, D. C., September 11, 1824. (42.)

14th. Copy of letter from Samuel L. Southard, Secretary of the Navy, to Commodore Porter, dated Navy Department, October 14, 1824. (43.)

It was also agreed that the official reports of Lieutenant Sloat, and the accompanying documents and correspondence printed in the pamphlet, from page 100 to the end of that publication, be submitted to the court as if given in evidence on this trial.

It is also agreed that the following note, published in the National Journal of June 14, 1825, being the anonymous publication or note referred to in Captain Porter's letter to the Secretary of the Navy, of June 14, 1825, and in the testimony of Peter Force, and which, it is admitted, was communicated to the editor of the said National Journal by R. S. Coxe, Esq., judge advocate of the court of inquiry therein mentioned, with the authority to communicate his name as the author of it, when applied to for that purpose, be annexed to the record as evidence in this case:

To the editor of the National Journal:

It appears necessary to apprise the public that the recent publication of Commodore Porter, on the subject of the proceedings of the court of inquiry in relation to the affair at Foxardo, presents so inaccurate and imperfect a view of that matter that it will, in due time, receive proper attention. The record of the court, and statement of the facts transmitted to the Executive, not having yet been made public, and it being understood that the business has not been t rminated, furnish sufficient reasons for postponing to a more suitable period the rectification of the errors and the supplying the deficiencies which exist in the pamphlet referred to.

JUNE 13, 1825.

The reading of the documents having been completed, the court adjourned until two o'clock on Monday.

MONDAY, August 1, 1825.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of Saturday. Present: all the members of the court, the judge advocate, and Captain Porter. The minutes of the proceedings of Saturday were read.

Captain Porter stated that his counsel, not having yet completed the defence which he purposed to submit to the court, requested the further indulgence of the court until to-morrow at 12 o'clock, by which time he would endeavor to be prepared.

The judge advocate then read and submitted to the court certa'n documents from the Navy Department.

1st. Copy of a letter from Commodore Porter to Secretary of Navy, dated Washington, October 12, 1824. (44.)

2d. Copy of a letter from same to the same, dated Washington, Oct. 19th, 1824. (45.)

Captain Porter then objected to the reading of these letters, or more of this kind, on the ground that they had no relation to or connection with the charges or specifications; that he was prepared to meet any other charge which either now, or at any future time, might be preferred for any part of his conduct, but that he was now without his counsel, and must of himself, object to the production of this testimony.

The judge advocate remarked, that the letters were offered as the answers to letters read on Saturday; or, as letters to which some of those were answers; that a part of the correspondence having been read, it seemed proper to submit the residue of it.

The court being cleared, proceeded to deliberate upon the question, and after some time it was opened, when the resolution of the court was announced, that the papers should be read, but that the court would adjourn until to-morrow, that the counsel for the accused might be present at the reading of the same. The court adjourned till ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

TUESDAY, August 2, 1825.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court (excepting Captain Tingey,) the judge advocate and Captain Porter. Captain Tingey transmitted an order from the Secretary of the Navy, which occasioned his temporary absence.

The proceedings of yesterday were read.

Captain Porter, by his counsel, then submitted some objections to the letters which it was proposed to read, and the court was cleared to deliberate on the same.

After the court was cleared, Captain Tingey appeared, and resumed his seat; on the opening of the court, the following proceedings were announced:

The judge advocate stated to the court that the papers which he had proposed to submit appeared to him to be intimately connected with what were read on Saturday, and equally relevant to the case with them: but that he was not particularly desirous to press the evidence before the court. The court having maturely considered the same, is of opinion that much, if not all, of the evidence submitted by the accused on Saturday is wholly irrelevant to the subject matter before it; but, it being submitted by him, and not objected to by the judge advocate, it was received without hesitation: as, however, it is the opinion of the court that it is irrelevant, it is not deemed necessary or proper to pursue that part of the investigation further; and, as it is not objected to by the judge advocate, and appears to be the desire of the accused, the court will not receive or annex to the record any of the five papers to which the objection extends.

The counsel for the accused then submitted to the court sundry documents of an official nature. The court having been cleared to deliberate upon the papers submitted, and having considered the same, is of opinion that the evidence is not admissible before the court, being wholly irrelevant to the charges and specifications. The counsel for the accused having been understood to intimate that the object intended by offering the document was to illustrate the construction which the government had given to the instructions from the Department, the court conceiving this to constitute an insufficient reason for admitting the same as evidence in the cause, it has therefore decided not to receive the testimony offered. It is not, however, designed to preclude the accused from resorting to any documents of a public and official kind, which he may conceive to furnish him with sources of argument, in his defence.

The court being opened, the foregoing proceedings were announced.

The counsel for the accused having stated that he had no other testimony to submit, the evidence was considered as closed. He was then asked when he should be prepared with the defence; he replied by stating that he might possibly be prepared by Thursday, but could not promise positively to have it ready before Friday.

The court then adjourned till to-morrow, at 10 o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, August 3, 1825.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court, (excepting Captain Ridgley,) the judge advocate, and Captain Porter.

The minutes of the proceedings of yesterday were read.

Captain Ridgley was prevented by indisposition from attending the sitting of the court to-day. The court adjourned till ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

THURSDAY, August 4, 1825.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court, the judge advocate, and Captain Porter. The minutes of the proceedings of yesterday were read.

Captain Porter having intimated that his counsel would be prepared by eleven o'clock to-morrow, the court adjourned till that hour.

FRIDAY, August 5, 1825.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court, the judge advocate, and Captain Porter. The minutes of the proceedings of yesterday were read. The counsel for the accused, having obtained permission of the court, proceeded to deliver the defence. Before concluding it, at his request, the court adjourned till to-morrow morning, at eleven o'clock.

SATURDAY, August 6.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court, the judge advocate, and Captain Porter. The minutes of the proceedings of yesterday were read. The delivery of the defence was resumed, and when it was concluded, the counsel having undertaken to hand in the defence on Monday morning, that the same might be annexed to the record, the court adjourned till Monday morning at 10 o'clock.

MONDAY, August 8.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of Saturday. Present: all the members of the court, and the judge advocate. The minutes of the proceedings of Saturday were read.

It was announced to the court that the defence was not ready to be submitted to the court to-day, but that it should be ready by to-morrow. It was determined by the court to go on with the business before it with closed doors. The room was accordingly cleared, and the proceedings of the court were read over. The reading continued until after three o'clock, when the court adjourned till 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

TUESDAY, August 9.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court and the judge advocate. The room being cleared, the residue of the proceedings was read.

The defence not having been transmitted, the court came to the following resolution:

Resolved by the court, That this court has felt and exhibited a disposition during the progress of this trial to allow every indulgence to the accused which the most cautious regard to his feelings and wishes could dictate: that with this disposition, delays, and a course of practice, have been submitted to, in which the court has reluctantly acquiesced: that arguments, instead of being prepared, when offered to the court, in such a state as to be annexed to the record, have, after an ample allowance of time, been delivered orally, and an equal length of time afterwards consumed in committing the same to writing. That in regard to the defence, after having waited for an unusual length of time, it was in fact delivered to the court orally, and as a written document it has not been presented to the court this the third day after its public delivery; the court feels constrained to notice this conduct, which it cannot pass over without an expression of its disapprobation, and has determined that, unless the paper is ready by the meeting of the court to-morrow, the court will proceed to judgment without it. And it is requested of the judge advocate that a copy of the foregoing resolution be transmitted to the accused this afternoon.

At three o'clock the court adjourned till ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

WEDNESDAY, August 10.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court and the judge advocate. The minutes of the proceedings of yesterday were read.

The judge advocate stated that, in compliance with the wishes of the court, he had left a letter directed to Captain Porter, containing a copy of the foregoing resolutions, with the counsel of the accused yesterday, on his return from the court.

The defence not having been transmitted, the court proceeded to deliberate upon the charges, specifications, the evidence that had been submitted, and what had been alleged in behalf of the accused; and during the deliberation, the defence upon the first charge was communicated to the court, annexed, and marked P.

After having carefully and maturely weighed and deliberated upon the matter, the court is of opinion that the specification of the first charge is fully proved, and does adjudge the accused GUILTY of the first charge.

The court is also of opinion that the first specification of the second charge is proved in part; that it is fully proved so far as regards the letter to the President, of the seventeenth day of April, 1825, and the letters to the Secretary of the Navy, of the thirtieth day of January, the thirteenth day of April, and the fourteenth day of June, 1825—each of which the court conceives to be of the character attributed to them in the said specification; but it does not consider the letter of the sixteenth day of March as liable to the same censure; and, therefore, so far as regards this last-mentioned letter, the court is of opinion that this specification is not proved. The court is also of opinion that the second, third, fourth, and fifth specifications of the second charge are fully proved. The court is of opinion that the second charge is fully proved, and does accordingly adjudge the accused GUILTY of the same.

In deciding upon the first charge, and the specifications under it, the court, however, feels itself called upon to ascribe the conduct of the accused, which is deemed censurable, to an anxious disposition on his part to maintain the honor and advance the interests of the nation and the service.

The court also thinks it proper to state that, in deciding that the third specification is proved, it is of the opinion that, so far as respects the inaccuracies pointed out by the judge advocate in the paper annexed to the record and marked No. 15, this specification is fully proved, but the court sees no reason to believe that the errors and inaccuracies therein indicated were the result of design or of improper motive; that, with the exception of such errors as have been particularly noted, the publication by the accused of the proceedings of the court of inquiry appears to be a correct transcript of the record.

In forming its opinion upon the fourth specification, the court is satisfied that the same is fully proved in the following particulars:

In the advertisement "by the conduct of the court, to which the subject was referred for investigation, I was driven from its presence, and prevented from making the explanations on which I founded my justification."

In the remarks, page 24, "I could not consent to defend myself before the court against any charge whatever, until its legality had been decided by competent authority—until I could appear before it on terms of perfect equality with my accusers—until I could be allowed to protect myself in the way which might appear to me most proper; without submitting my defence to the inspection of the judge advocate, who had no right to decide in my case; or to the control of the court, who would thereby have exercised a power not founded in law or justice; and without the risk of undeserved reproof."

In page 25: "But it was the duty of the court to decide whether it was or was not competent; the decision, as to its belief on the subject, on oath, was all that was required by me, and the question could have been decided by the court as readily, and as well before as it was after the instructions of the Secretary had been received; that it did not decide in the first instance, is sufficient evidence that doubts then existed as to its legality."

"Under all circumstances, then, I had nothing to lose or apprehend by my withdrawal from the court, and I certainly saved a very useless sacrifice of my feelings, as (except in its deportment towards me, while before it) it could do me neither good or harm. A court more powerless, and yet more calculated to alarm the accused, was perhaps never formed."

"The charge first to be investigated was exhibited against me by the Secretary of the Navy; the Secretary of the Navy selected my judges, two of whom were junior to me. The judge advocate, who is the primum mobile of all military courts, received his appointment from the Secretary, and is his warm friend and protégé. Under these circumstances, it may readily be imagined I had everything to apprehend, and nothing to hope for while before the court; and to defend myself under the conditions imposed on me, would have been worse than useless."

In the remarks in page 31, it appears to the court to be implied that all the documents, upon which the court of inquiry founded its opinion, were contained in the pamphlet, which was not the fact.

The court also includes, as proof of this specification, the second paragraph of the paper marked E, in page 40 of the pamphlet.

The court does therefore sentence and adjudge the said Captain David Porter to be suspended for the term of six months, from the date hereof.

Having come to the aforesaid determination, and the residue of the defence not having been transmitted, the court, for the purpose of enabling the judge advocate to prepare in due form, and record the said findings, and it being after four o'clock, adjourned till eleven o'clock to-morrow morning.

THURSDAY, August 11, 1825.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court and the judge advocate. The proceedings of yesterday having been read, the court proceeded to sign this, the record of its proceedings, the finding and sentence.

RICHARD S. COXE, Judge Advocate.

THURSDAY, August 11.

The record of the proceedings in the case of Captain David Porter having been signed and transmitted to the Department, the court, by virtue of an order for that purpose from the Secretary of the Navy, directed to the president, and hereunto annexed and marked A, adjourned to meet to-morrow morning at ten o'clock, at the building on First street east, and the corner of Maryland avenue, formerly occupied by the Congress of the United States.

FRIDAY, August 12.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court and the judge advocate. The judge advocate read and submitted to the court a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, which was annexed and marked B, and the record of the proceedings as transmitted yesterday to the Department, with the paper referred to as a continuance of the defence of Captain Porter.

The paper having been read, on motion of a member, the court determined that it will adjourn until ten o'clock to-morrow, and that Captain Porter be informed that the court will receive the residue of the defence at that hour.

The court adjourned until to-morrow at ten o'clock.

SATURDAY, August 13.

The court met pursuant to adjournment of yesterday. Present: all the members of the court, and the judge advocate. The proceedings of yesterday were read. The residue of the defence was received at near twelve o'clock, and the court proceeded to read the same.

After completing the reading of the document, the following motion was made and adopted:

The judge advocate having stated that he had received from the accused certain papers, purporting to be the residue of his defence, the same were read and considered. The court is decidedly of opinion that these papers vary in many respects from the defence which was delivered on behalf of the accused, by his counsel: that, in particular, the severity of animadversion upon the conduct of the judge advocate, which appears in these papers, did not appear in the defence that was delivered, and the court deems it due to itself to state that the conduct of the judge advocate during the trial was, in its opinion, free from the censure imputed to it.

As, however, the court is not in possession of the defence, which, in violation of its rule and of precedent, was delivered orally, and from notes under the appearance of reading it, the court has annexed this document to its proceedings, with this further observation, that nothing is perceived in it which can in the least vary the conclusion to which the court had arrived.

JAMES BARRON, President.

RICHARD S. COXE, Judge Advocate.

The court adjourned till ten o'clock on Monday morning.

Approved.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

AUGUST 17, 1825.

Notes of the principal heads of argument and authority, in support of the objections taken by the counsel of Commodore Porter to the second charge and specification of the same.

The counsel is well aware how much out of place, before a court-martial, are the nice and abstruse subtilties, and the merely technical rules, peculiar to some branches of practice in the courts of common law. He will, therefore, implicitly follow the advice of a learned civilian, (who has made military jurisprudence, and the analagous principles and practice of municipal jurisprudence, as administered in courts of civil and criminal judicature, the subject of an elaborate, practical, and useful essay,) and who very prudently and properly recommends to counsel, engaged in the conduct of a defence before a court-martial, to avoid every topic calculated to perplex and embarrass the judgment of gentlemen not professionally conversant with the law, by "forcing the discordant and unsuitable axioms and rules of civil courts upon a 'military tribunal.'" Accordingly, no "rules or axioms of the civil courts" are adverted to, upon this occasion, but such as have been distinctly invoked to the practice of "military tribunals;" or such as, being founded in the immutable principles of right and justice, are necessarily common to both, and cannot be dispensed with by either without consigning the subjects of its jurisdiction to an unqualified tyranny. The truth is, there is no essential difference, either in the form of procedure, or in the principles, by which both are guided in the administration of criminal justice. The course of proceedings at British courts-martial is said to assimilate more nearly to trials for high treason in the courts of common law; because prisoners, tried for that crime, have greater privileges allowed them by statute than what are allowed in criminal prosecutions for other offences.*

All the forms of procedure of the civil courts, in the department of criminal judicature, are simple and concise: they are clear of the technical subtilties and of the nice and artificial distinctions which have resulted from the abstruse and complicated rules of property, and the perplexed dialectics of special pleading: they are the result of great sagacity, long experience, and a practical insight of human affairs; exerted in the compilation of a system of rules, necessary to the protection of property, life and reputation against the irregular, capricious and vindictive action of power. 'Tis beyond the reach of human sagacity to institute or digest any system which is to act with infallible and undeviating truth and accuracy in all the diversified occasions of practice; consequently, in some particular instances, the forms with which human rights are fenced in and guarded, may rather inconveniently fetter and retard the march of substantial justice: these forms are nevertheless wholesome and necessary; and 'tis better to endure some partial inconveniences than encroach upon the conspicuous and well-defined land-marks, intended as impassable barriers against the oppressions of the mighty upon the weak. And of all the modes in which might can demonstrate its cupidity or its wrath, to the danger of individual security and justice, and against which every free community is the most provident and circumspect in devising, and most tenacious in maintaining wholesome checks and restraints,—is that of high-seated power, bearing down upon its victim with all the weight and circumstance of official splendor and influence, in a state prosecution. A vulgar error has sometimes prevailed, to the great disparagement of the military character, that a military establishment must necessarily be composed of men who have voluntarily surrendered all the essential rights of citizens, and who have abandoned everything sacred and dear in life and honor, to the uncontrolled will and unregulated power of the government. Against such an absurdity it would be superfluous to contend, before an intelligent and experienced tribunal, composed, as is the present, of gentlemen who have been disciplined in the rights and duties, alike of civil and of military life: as every man, aspiring to wield the arms of an enlightened republic, must be, or sink into the pernicious and degraded instrument of usurpation and despotism.

Then it is one of the fundamental and uncompromising maxims, as well of martial, as of every other human law, that it should define, beforehand, and with precision, the offences which it punishes; the only alternative is to leave it to the absolute discretion of every successive court-martial to determine, without any fixed rule or guide, upon each particular accusation, whether the act charged be one which the law either designed or ought to have punished. This alternative is universally held to be the very essence of tyranny; and utterly incompatible with any sound principle, by which either military discipline and police are maintained, or the forms of civil government instituted. Wholesome restrains of the ceaseless tendency of power to excess, and to irregular exertions of its force, and well defined rules by which individuals may certainly know what actions are either enjoined or forbidden, are just as necessary to the conservation of the military as of the social virtues. Once beat down the barriers by which the essential rights of the soldier are protected against the invasion of vindictive or capricious power, and every tie of subordination, but that of brute force, is dissolved. The generosity of soul that ennobles valor, and gives all its moral elevation and dignity to the military spirit, is extinguished; his rapid degeneracy renders him no longer formidable to any but to the state which has degraded and debased him. No government, whose institutions bear the remotest affinity to our own, has ever acted upon the notion that persons in military capacities were to have their relative rights and privileges defined, or guarded by any less fixed, certain, known and precise laws and rules of conduct than their fellow citizens in civil capacities; or that criminal justice was to be administered, in military courts, with any less regard to the fundamental principles of legal justice than in other courts of judicature. The rights and privileges of the janissary are just as well defined in theory, and respected in practice, as those of any other of the sujects of Turkey; where all are equally exposed to the arbitrary caprices of a power which is despotic, only because it is of indefinite extent, and vague and uncertain in its limitations and in its rules of action. These same janissaries, at once the instruments and the terror of the despotism they uphold, are but the type of what every military establishment must become, when placed out of the pale of the general law, by which the relative rights and duties of individuals are defined, and which determines, by fixed, known and precise rules, the offences which may draw down the penalties of vindictive justice.

Accordingly, all the regular governments of modern times, which have made much progress in civilization and improvement, have been at great pains to digest codes for their fleets and armies, by which all military crimes and punishments have been enumerated and defined with more or less precision.

Indeed, so manifest is the expediency and indispensable the justice of extending to military men and to military tribunals all those essentials, and generally received principles and forms of judicial justice, which are supposed to constitute the sanctions of property, life and reputation to the citizens at large, that the practice is said to prevail, in many of the foreign services on the continent of Europe, of extending to soldiers the privilege of being tried by their peers; for which purpose some of the same rank with the prisoner, from officers of the highest rank to privates, are admitted as members of courts-martial. This practice has, it seems, been recommended, but successfully opposed, in the British service.*

In Britain it has been for a century and a half the subject of anxious and minute legislation, in successive parliaments, which has resulted in a compilation of criminal law, for their fleets and armies, as elaborate, and perhaps, more systematic and complete, in its kind, than any they have hitherto framed for the community at large. The British articles of war, both military and naval, have been respectively adopted by Congress, with such modifications as were thought necessary to fit them to the peculiar organization of our own establishments; and it must, in candor, be confessed, that our alterations of the British system have not been uniformly for the better, but, in one or two particular instances, presently to be remarked upon, decidedly for the worse.

Of the forty-two articles adopted by the act of Congress for the government of the navy, thirty (from the 3d to the 32d inclusive) constitute what may be called the criminal code of the navy; in which all the offences cognizable by a naval court-martial are enumerated and defined; the appropriate punishments for each kind and degree of offence prescribed; a tribunal for the trial of them constituted, and a few of the most essential and indispensable forms of procedure laid down.

Then the first and radical question in every prosecution before a court-martial is, whether the matter of the accusation be cognizable by the court as constituting any offence enumerated and defined in the given code of criminal law: there the offence is to be found, or nowhere: by that authority it is to be punished, or by none.

In Britain, it is said that the "crimes cognizable by courts-martial are pointed out by the mutiny act and articles of war; which every military man is or ought to be acquainted with:"† and again, that "martial law is laid down in so plain and simple a manner, that every military man is or ought to be acquainted with what are thereby deemed crimes."‡ It is further said not to be necessary to refer, in the charge, to the particular articles of war supposed to be violated; because "the specification of the criminal act is sufficient intimation to the prisoner;" who may "always dispute its relevancy, and call upon the prosecution to show in what respect it falls under the prohibitions of that law."§

A favorite idea has prevailed among military men, and with some military tribunals, that a court-martial is not only a solemn tribunal of criminal judicature, but also a court of honor: privileged to erect a sort of censorial power over the minor morals of the members of the profession; and, as such, to take cognizance of certain immoralities and indecorums, or of certain departures from the more delicate and refined points of honor, indispensable to the character and conduct of an accomplished officer and gentleman; but not prohibited or condemned by any positive law. This idea, to a certain extent, is not without some support from reason, authority and practice; but, to the extent here stated, is certainly erroneous, and contrary to the best established principles and precedents. It is true to any extent, only because the military code has, by positive enactment, extended the judicial cognizance of its courts to more minute transgressions of private morals than are cognizable in other courts: not that the military any more than the civil courts have any authority to try or to punish any act, not expressly constituted an offence, punishable under the military code. For instance, the British articles of war, both naval and military, make "scandalous, infamous behavior, such as is unbecoming the character of an officer and a gentleman," an offence punishable by dismission from the service:‖ and this article has undergone a version, in its adoption into our military code, extremely disadvantageous to its precision, and in short, to every commendable quality of a penal law: for there it is stripped of all the aggravations by which the offence is characterized in the British articles; as "behaving in a scandalous, infamous, cruel, oppressive or fraudulent manner, unbecoming the character," &c., and marks out for reprobation, and for the same sort and degree of punishment, as the British articles, conduct simply characterized as "unbecoming an officer and a gentleman;"¶ without specifying how or to what degree it is unbecoming to him; or whether to his moral or his professional character; or to his person or his manners. This article in neither of its forms is to be found among our naval articles of war; but there is among the latter one corresponding to the second of the British naval articles; which, after enumerating "oppression, cruelty, fraud, profane swearing, and drunkenness," concludes with "other scandalous conduct, tending to the destruction of good morals."*

Now here, it must be confessed, is ample scope for the exercise of a sound discretion in deciding, in one case, what acts are scandalous, infamous, &c.,—in another, what are "unbecoming an officer and gentleman;—in another, what immoralities, under the denomination of "other scandalous conduct," are equivalent, in turpitude, to the immediately preceding enumeration of "oppression, cruelty, fraud, &c.;" still it is nothing more than a sound discretion, acting under the authority and by the express mandate of the law—not an unlimited direction to legislate new offences into existence. When the nature and degree of the offence are once ascertained by the application of that sound discretion to the facts of the case, and these facts are found to bring the case within the operation of the law,—it is then an offence as emphatically embraced within the purview of the law, and as positively prohibited, as if it had been therein designated by name, or by the most specific description. After all, it is nothing more, in principle, than the ordinary discretion of every court of law to construe, interpret or expound the obscure, perplexed, and doubtful terms of general statutes. There is also vested in courts-martial an extensive discretion, as to the sort and degree of punishment to be inflicted for various transgressions. So every criminal court has more or less discretion to inflict optional punishments; and we see them, every day, deliberating on a fine from one cent to any indefinite amount; or imprisonment from one hour to seven years, or no imprisonment at all.

In short, the exercise of this sound legal discretion, by whatever court, civil or military, and to whatever degree, is nothing more or less than the judicial exposition, or the judicial execution of a positive law; and leaves the conclusion untouched, that no offence is cognizable by a court-martial but what is prohibited and punished by some article of the military code, under the authority of which the court acts; and consequently, that every accusation or charge must set out in terms an offence so prohibited and punished, or be excluded from the cognizance and jurisdiction of the court.

The defect of power in a court-martial to erect itself into a court of honor, and, as such, to assume censorial jurisdiction over such breaches of good manners, or good morals, or of decorum and gentlemanly demeanor, as are not made positively unlawful by the articles of war, or some statute, is strongly illustrated by the case of a British officer, tried at the Cape of Good Hope, under a charge of "scandalous, infamous conduct, unbecoming the character of an officer and a gentleman;" in support of which, it was proved that, after making a present of a horse to a general officer, he sent in a charge of £600 for the same horse. Upon which the court acquitted him of the graver part of the charge, "scandalous, infamous behavior;" but found him guilty of mean, dishonorable, and ungentlemanly conduct, for which they sentenced him to six months' suspension, &c. Yet, upon an appeal to the King in council, it was solemnly decided that the court had no jurisdiction over this inferior immorality of mean, shabby conduct; but that, having acquitted him of the legal part of the charge, he stood acquitted altogether.†

The point may now be taken, as clearly established, that a court-martial, being a court of limited and defined jurisdiction, in respect both of persons and offences, can take no cognizance of any act or word but such as is positively prohibited and punished by the military code, and can exercise no discretion in determining either the legal or the moral character of such act or word, but what is expressly communicated to it by law.

This brings us to the consideration of the form and substance of the accusation or charge, in order to determine: 1st, whether any offence, cognizable by the court, be set out in terms; and 2d, if there be, whether it is set forth in such manner and form, and with such specifications, as, according to the established law and practice of courts-martial, may justify calling upon the prisoner to answer.

A more particular enumeration of the terms, in which the charges and specifications now objected to are conceived, may be usefully preceded by a succinct analysis of the rules, by which the form of such accusations is prescribed. These rules shall be deduced from the most approved writers and authorities upon martial law alone; all of whom concur, with undeviating unanimity, in the terms of the rules to be cited, and rival each other in the amplifications and illustrations, by which the utility and necessity of a strict observance of them are enforced.

Then there must be a certainty of the offence committed; it must be set out in such terms as bring it unequivocally or clearly within the law or statute, by which it is made punishable; in some instances, even words synonymous with those of the article prohibiting the offence do not suffice; but the very words of the law must be used, as in case of mutiny, &c., and the special manner of the whole fact must be set forth with certainty, in the specifications. All the circumstances of time and place, and of the acts charged, must be minutely described. If disrespectful, contemptuous or mutinous words be imputed to him, the very words must be specified; and it is not enough for a witness to say that words of such an effect were spoken, but he must prove the very words. The more general and vague the description of the offence in the article by which it is punished, the more particular and minute must be the specifications in the accusation of the facts and circumstances intended to be proved in support of it. It is agreed, on all hands, that there must be the same precision and the same minuteness (and in many instances greater minuteness) as in indictments in the civil courts. One author, Mr. Tytler, a Scotch advocate, and of course a civilian, would rather compare it to a libel, (which is equivalent, in the tribunals under the civil or Roman law, to an indictment or criminal information at common law,) because the libel deals in more minute and diffuse specifications of the facts and circumstances charged, and it is certain that a court-martial more resembles a tribunal of the civil law than of the common law, since the members unite in their own persons the character both of judge and jury.‡

The rationale of the rule is the same in all courts, which is, that the prisoner being thus minutely informed, under what law, for what offence, and of what facts he is accused, may duly prepare him for his trial. In the same spirit, it is required that he be furnished with a true copy of the charges and specifications, and the names and descriptions of the witnesses for the prosecution, in due time before his trial. The object of this rule is not only that he may be prepared to meet the matter of the charge, but to canvass, and if necessary impeach the competency or the credit of the witnesses; and after a copy of the charges has been thus served upon the prisoner, they are unalterable, but under peculiar and extraordinary circumstances.*

All this is the established law and practice of courts-martial, deduced from the strongest analogies of judicial justice; and on the best authorities, deduced from the most approved treatises upon the law and practice of such courts. But, in this country, it does not rest upon such authorities alone, but upon these authorities, recognized adopted and embodied into our naval articles of war; by which it is expressly enacted that the "person accused shall be furnished with a true copy of the charges, with the specifications," &c.† If, therefore, the general doctrine required any corroboration from statutory enactment, here it is; for, in the use of the term "specifications," everything is implied that had been authentically held to be involved in its true meaning and effect.

Now let this second charge and its specifications be brought to the test of these rules.

First of all, as an indictment or information for an offence cognizable by a court of common law, it is impossible for any lawyer to hesitate one instant in pronouncing that it would be utterly vicious and void; not for the want of any forms or solemnities, merely technical, but for the most essential and palpable defects of matter and substance.

Then, by this test, it fails; there is a plain and incurable failure; the whole must be rejected and set aside.

But let the context be minutely examined and tried by the loosest rules that the greatest latitudinarian in military jurisprudence could desire.

Before its validity, as the description of any offence within the terms of the naval articles of war, can be determined, its meaning must be ascertained; and that is the most uncertain, obscure, and perplexed imaginable.

The charge itself, considered separate and apart from the specifications, consists of two members, but both, it is presumed, intending the same identical act or offence, and only describing it with superadded aggravations; the conduct imputed was unbecoming an officer, because it was insubordinate.

The first member of the charge is "insubordinate conduct;" and here we are at sea, without chart or compass; for the conduct imputed to the accused is characterized by an epithet unknown to our language. Being unable to discover it in any vocabulary, or in any document of the language, either of science or of general literature, it was presumed to be a term of art, and peculiar to the art military. But no research in our power to make into the nomenclature of that art has been attended with any greater success. The next process was to resort to the etymology of the word; and presuming it to be the negative or privative of "subordinate," the validity of the charge, as a precise accusation under some naval article of war, was tried by that test. But it was not found that the negative article of that adjective could, by any possibility, be made out to be such an accusation. Then presuming that the adjective "subordinate" might have some peculiar and technical meaning, distinct from what is affixed to it in the language of science and general literature, military dictionaries and other works upon the art military have been consulted, but in vain, to detect any such technical meaning. On the contrary, the only book on military affairs (and that is one expressly written on military jurisprudence) in which our very partial research has discovered the word, uses it precisely in the same sense as it is found in the language of science and general literature—that is, as indicating the gradations in the series of military rank;‡ exactly agreeing with the definition of the word given by the best authorities—"inferior in order; descending in a regular series." So the negative of this quality would charge Commodore Porter with "conduct not inferior in order, not descending in a regular series;" and under what article of war may such conduct be brought? The process of etymology has been pushed still further in order to discover the true meaning of this charge; the substantive "subordination" has been pressed into the service; and 'tis found that, in military language, it has acquired a meaning somewhat different from that by which it is generally defined and understood—namely, an obedience to orders.§ Then, if by any legitimate coinage, "insubordinate conduct" could be understood as expressing the negative of subordination, we have nothing more nor less than a charge of "disobedience of orders, and conduct unbecoming an officer;" a repetition verbatim et literatim of the first charge, for which the accused is now under trial.

This identity of the first and second charges, thus elaborated from the devious circumlocution of loose anologies of the periphrasis supposed to be couched in the terms of the second charge, is the most favorable interpretation, for the dilemma is fairly put: it must have that meaning, or no meaning.

In that sense of the charge, which of the five specifications, or what circumstance in any of them, squints at any disobedience of orders?

The second member of the charge, "conduct unbecoming an officer," though free from the solecism of language apparent in the other, is equally foreign to the terms and definitions of any naval article of war. Even under the extremely vague terms of the 83d military article of war (which is here distanced in vagueness and uncertainty) it would be utterly untenable; but, as the naval code contains no analogous articles, there can be less justification here of this indefinite and unintelligible charge. Nothing is more uncertain, nothing more dependent upon the evanescent caprices of taste and fashion, than what may "become an officer." It may be very unbecoming in him to do a thousand of the most innocent or indifferent things in the world; he may wear his hat, or his sword, or his coat, after a very unbecoming fashion; what might be very becoming in a young lieutenant of twenty, might be quite otherwise in the hoary veteran. In short, there is no end to the minute instances in which he may transgress the decorums of life and good breeding, without bringing himself within any of the penal prohibitions of military law.

The charge itself being vicious and defective in its terms, it becomes, in a measure, useless to inquire into the nature of the specifications; for if the charge falls, the whole substratum of the specifications, everything that gives them significancy or application, is taken away.

We have not, however, stopped here, but have endeavored to discover whether these specifications ascertained; with any precision, the true meaning and gravamen of the charge. The result will be found in the following summary of them.

§ Duane's Military Dictionary, in voc.

Specification 1. In explainingt he meaning of the charge, by this specification, a notable instance of the old paradox of the "ignotum per ignotius," met us at the threshhold: of the obscure explained by the more obscure; "confusion, worse confounded," followed from explaining "insubordinate conduct" by "insubordinate letters." We are here told that the conduct, complained of in the charge, consisted in the writing of "various letters of an insubordinate and disrespectful character." Here, our old difficulty, from the new-coined word, insubordinate, again opposes our research after a meaning—a difficulty certainly not diminished by being applied to letters. Our former analogical definition, "disobedience of orders," seems to be further from the mark than ever. It might be well enough conceived how a man might be ordered not to write a letter, and might, by writing one, disobey the order; but how the letter itself could acquire the quality or character of being "insubordinate," is not so easy to be imagined. Now, take the other characteristic of these letters, that of being "disrespectful," and what article of war denounces "disrespectful letters" as a military offence? Besides, neither the tenor nor the substance and effect of these letters is set forth; then how are they disrespectful? In what degree; in what does the disrespect consist; and to whom was it offered? All these particulars are left to the vaguest and most uncertain conjecture. There would be no end to the possible modes and degrees in which a letter may be deemed disrespectful. The disrespectful character here imputed to these letters may consist of such a minute transgression of high breeding as that mentioned in a certain popular novel; where a very refined and fastidious gentleman, receiving a letter sealed with a wafer, instead of wax, indignantly spurns at it as contaminated by the spittle of the writer.

Upon this whole subject of disrespectful letters, or disrespectful conduct, it may be sufficient to say that no such offence, in any of its modes or degrees, is to be found among the naval articles of war. The 5th and 6th of the military articles do, indeed, punish contemptuous or disrespectful words towards a certain description of enumerated persons; but there are no such articles in the naval code; and if there were, there is no charge or specification to bring the case within them. The naval code punishes mutinous words, and the treatment of a superior officer with contempt.* There is no pretence here that any conduct or any language of Com. Porter was liable to either of these imputations. "Contempt" to a superior officer, is a technical term, and is, by no means, necessarily comprehended in the imputation of "disrespectful letters," or "disrespectful insinuations." Besides, there is not in this charge, or in any of the specifications, the least suggestion that any disrespect was conveyed, either by the letters or by the insinuations, to a superior officer, within the meaning of the 13th naval article. But the specifications are all so radically and incurably defective, in other respects, that this is scarce worth mentioning.

Specification 2. This might be discussed by a single question, namely: What article of war, or what other law, had made it unlawful, or, in any sense, improper, to publish the proceedings of the court of inquiry after that court had made its report—had finally disposed of the subject, and had been dissolved? The proceedings of the court were necessarily open and public to all the world; all the world was free to publish them; and why not Commodore Porter?—if, indeed, it be not a solecism in terms to accuse him of publish'ng what was already public, without any agency, active or passive, on his part.

This presents a very different question from that of publishing, during the progress and pendency of a trial, detailed reports of the evidence, from day to day—a practice peculiarly incompatible with the order of proceeding, and principles of practice in military courts, and highly improper and mischievous, for many obvious reasons, in any court. If Commodore Porter had violated the respect and duty incumbent on him, as a party before the court of inquiry, by making any such obnoxious publication, he would, doubtless, have been called to a summary account by the court, in the exercise of its incidental power to punish the contempts of parties and witnesses. But with the trial, every reason against a detailed and public report of the proceedings ceased; and, accordingly, it is one of the most ordinary, and, at the same time, of the most unquestioned rights, to publish such reports after the trial. In this case the functions of the court of inquiry, upon which such publication might have operated improperly, had ceased; and if any inconvenience has been experienced in practice, from publications which may operate on the deliberations of the Executive, by convincing or informing his judgment, it will be time enough to punish the act when some law shall have made it an offence. In this specification, then, is the absence of every circumstance that might have shown how this publication was, either actually or possibly, mischievous. The nature of the proceedings, so published, and the motives and objects of the publication, are circumstances that are altogether overlooked.

Specification 3. "An incorrect statement of the proceedings." Here, again, we ask, what definite idea, either of the fact, or of the gravamen of the charge, does this specification afford? Wherein does the incorrectness consist? Is it in the punctuation, the orthography, the syntax, or any other transgression of grammatical rules? In what degree, and to what extent, is it incorrect? and with what design or motive was it made so? Is it in material or immaterial circumstances; from inadvertency or design? Here, again, we are left to illimitable conjecture; for all these particulars, which should have been distinctly and precisely detailed, and set forth in the charge and specifications, and which, after they had been drawn out in the minutest detail, could have constituted no offence cognizable by this court, unless criminal falsehood, from corrupt or malicious motives, could have been imputed, so as to make out a charge of scandalous conduct, &c., under the 3d naval article of war.

Specification 4. Here we have nothing but a new version, without the least amendment, in point of minuteness or precision, of the 3d specification. It contains only some additional aggravation, but not one additional fact; the aggravation is that the same publication contained insinuations, highly disrespectful to the Secretary of the Navy and to the court of inquiry. This might, also, be disposed of by a single question, namely, what article of the naval code makes any such disrespectful insinuations criminal? But it may be further asked, what passages of the publication were fraught with these insinuations, and with what insinuations were they fraught? were not all these particulars specified, so that the court might have judged, for itself, whether the inuendoes were legitimate deductions from the context; and, if so, whether disrespectful, and in what degree, and to whom? As it now stands, the whole matter is left so vague and uncertain as to defy the sagacity of the most experienced jury of sworn guessers—if, as has been reported, but I know not upon what authority, there ever were, at any time or place, any such auxiliary to the regular administration of justice.

Specification 5. After what has been said of the others, this requires little or no comment. What particular documents are here alluded to and intended, under the general description of "official communications and correspondence," or of "public orders and instructions;" whether there were any injunction of secrecy respecting them, either express, from a competent authority, or necessarily implied by their nature and character; to whom they were disclosed; the time when, the place where, and the manner how; are circumstances unexplained and altogether overlooked, which it would be vain to guess at; and if, perchance, they should be come at by the most fortunate and miraculous of guessers, they would be utterly inconsequential and useless, under the existing frame of the principle charge.

No one circumstance, either of the distinctive description and identity of the documents, or of the time, place or manner of their publication, is given; except that one set is said to have been "made public," "in the same publication" referred to in the former specification: and that the other set is said to have been "made public," "on other occasions," within a given period of about eight or nine months. Now, if every other objection were out of the way, what should be said to this latitude of time, in the face of the conclusive authorities, above cited,* by which the utmost latitude allowed (and that only in extraordinary cases, and from an evident necessity) is an alternative either of the day, or of the month, immediately preceding or succeeding some certain day or month named in the specification?

The aim and ultimate end of these objections are analogous to a motion to quash an indictment, in a court of common law, for any inherent vice in its frame, which makes it evidently vain and fruitless to proceed with the trial of it.

The counsel would beg leave, in conclusion, to remark, that, in raising these objections against the regularity and the efficacy of the procedure in this case, and taking some pains to explain the grounds of his objections, he was actuated by public considerations, apart from the particular interests, and unconnected with the personal wishes and inclinations of his distinguished client. The principles involved in these objections are certainly of general interest, and permanent importance to the service; and now, amid the repose of a profound peace, is the accepted time to adjust the land-marks, and consolidate the bulwarks of right and justice, in matters of military judicature; to establish well considered and safe precedents; and to supersede all such, if any there be, as, amid the haste and confusion of active service, have been unadvisedly and silently admitted in practice, to the peril of the individual security, the dignity and respectability of our military establishments.† All these considerations, doubtless, deserve, and will receive the deliberate attention of this court; but they are not such as, alone, should have determined the professional course of the counsel in the conduct of his client's defence. He clearly perceived, from the frame of the second charge and its specifications, that the whole matter of accusation, therein exhibited, not being within the prescribed limits of this court's jurisdiction, was necessarily excluded from it; and, being coram non judice, the trial of it would, necessarily, be a vain and fruitless consumption of time and labor; it could be brought to no judicial decision or conclusion of guilt or innocence; his client could neither be acquitted nor condemned. Under such circumstances, it was his imperious duty to quash a tedius and unpleasant discussion; irksome to all who feel an interest (and it is an interest coëxtensive with the limits of the country) in the tranquillity or reputation of the eminent and meritorious public functionaries involved in this dispute. To the force of the reasons Commodore Porter has, at length, yielded; after the earnest representations and unequivocal advice of his counsel had overcome a very natural and unaffected reluctance to, or to have done, in his behalf, anything that might expose him to any possible suspicion of a desire to evade a trial of the charge upon the evidence. Indeed, enough may be inferred, even from the very vague and unsatisfactory intimations of the charge and its specifications; from their cautious evasion, or timid recoil from every approach to a criminal accusation, without adverting to other matters of public notoriety, to repel every possible presumption of his fearing, or having reason to fear, the least detriment from the most comprehensive and minute investigation into this branch of the accusation.

Answer of the judge advocate to the preceding objections submitted by Commodore Porter's counsel.

The paper submitted to the court on Saturday was stated by the counsel of Captain Porter not to be precisely in that state in which he wished to annex it to the record. With a view of enabling him to complete the transcribing of it, and to correct any verbal inaccuracies which might, in the hurry of copying, have inadvertently crept into it, it was left with him under an engagement that it should be transmitted to me in the course of the evening. Not having received it, I was compelled to dispatch a messenger for it on the following morning, and it was not until about half after ten o'clock that it was put into my hands.

These circumstances are now referred to as my apology to the court for the imperfect manner in which it may be supposed I have replied to the long and ingenious paper of the accused, the work of an accomplished and skillful lawyer and scholar, prepared with ample time for reflection and research, and to which I am thus unexpectedly called upon to reply in the brief period of a few hours. Unwilling, however, that any delay in the proceedings of the court should be attributed to me, I shall endeavor to present to the court as full an exposition of my views and opinions upon the question submitted for its decision as, in the circumstances to which I have referred, is practicable.

It will scarcely be expected or desired by the court, that I should follow the learned and ingenious counsel through the discursive course which his exuberant powers enable him to pursue, with so much facility, beauty, and fancy, upon almost every occasion. I shall consider the questions in a simple and practical manner, and only labor so to present my views, as that they be at once perfectly intelligible to the members of the court, who are not presumed to be very deeply skilled in legal technicalities or philological criticisms, and at the same time exhibit a full answer to the argument that has been submitted.

Before proceeding, however, to examine critically the various subjects which have been urged to the second charge, and the specifications thereof, I would beg leave to submit a few preliminary remarks for the consideration of the court.

The analogy, which it has been the object of the learned counsel to draw between the proceedings of civil courts and military tribunals, and on which he has exhibited so much ingenuity and deep research, is admitted to a considerable extent. The object of all forensic proceedings is the same, and the forms of practice calculated to attain the end in view may well be supposed, even in different ages and in remote countries, to bear a considerable resemblance to each other. Still more reasonable is it to presume that the original practice of military courts was in a great measure borrowed from that which had been previously established in the civil tribunals of the same country. The principles of both were originally the same, the forms of proceeding were analogous, and though modifications would inevitably be introduced, from a variety of causes, and many forms familiar to the one be unknown to the other, yet a considerable resemblance would continue to subsist. It is, therefore, generally laid down by all writers on military courts, that when their own rules of practice and principles of decision are not calculated to meet the exigencies of a particular case, reference should be made to the civil courts of the same country to supply the deficiency. A reference ought perhaps to be made on the present occasion to the practice of the common law courts, and the result of such reference may be widely different from what is contemplated by the accused. No principle of law is better established in the civil courts of our country, as well those of criminal jurisdiction as those which are confined to the decision of private controversies—those which are governed by the principles of the common law as well as those which draw their origin and derive their principles of proceeding from the civil or Roman law, than that the accused in criminal prosecutions, and the defendant in private controversies, may avail himself, by way of defence, of a defect or informality in point of law in the charge alleged, or may controvert the facts upon which he is sought to be convicted. In the case of an indictment at the instance of the government, he may deny the facts with which he is charged, or, admitting them, may deny that those facts amount to a criminal offence. He may, to employ technical language, either demur, or take issue upon the indictment. He cannot, however, do both. He cannot plead not guilty to the indictment, and at the same time controvert its sufficiency in point of law. He may resort to either defence, but cannot at one and the same time adopt both. The rule is the same in civil controversies, and the practice of the civil law courts is precisely analogous.

Conceding then that the analogy exists, for which the accused so strongly contends, and which with certain modifications long and well established, undoubtedly exists; it would seem to follow, necessarily, that the accused in the present instance has a right which it is not intended to controvert, to make his option, whether he will demur to the charge, as insufficient in law, or deny it as unfounded in fact. He has chosen the former course, and the consequence of such election may be ascertained by reference to the practice of those courts from which his right is derived. "If the defendant demur to the indictment, whether in abatement or otherwise, and fail in the argument, he shall not have judgment to answer over, but the decision will operate as a conviction." Such is the doctrine laid down by one of the writers of criminal law of the highest authority.* Unless in cases where the punishment is death, in which, from principles of humanity, a greater latitude is allowed, a prisoner who demurs to the indictment, admits the facts with which he is charged, and rests his defence upon the law alone. Should the indictment be determined sufficient, he is adjudged guilty. The analogy then for which the accused contends in the present case would, if pressed to the extent to which it must be carried, if admitted at all, involve this consequence: that if it should be determined by the court that the present charge and the specifications under it, do contain an averment of an offence of which this court can take cognizance, he is precluded from going into any evidence either of exculpation or mitigation, but must by the decision of the court against the validity of these exceptions, be adjudged guilty to the full extent of all with which he is charged. Having selected the ground on which he will rest his defence, the very doctrine for which he so vehemently contends, confines him to that, and to that alone.

The present application to the court is assimilated by the counsel for the accused to a motion, sometimes made in criminal courts, to quash the indictment. The resemblance is defective in numerous particulars. It will be unnecessary to refer to more than one, which is perfectly decisive of this question, and which is distinctly stated by the same author from whom I have just quoted. "It is, therefore, a general rule, that no indictments which charge the higher offences, as treason or felony; or those crimes which immediately affect the public at large, as perjury, forgery, extortion, conspiracies, subornation, keeping disorderly houses, or offences affecting the highways, not executing legal process, will be thus summarily set aside."†

Another remark is eminently entitled to the consideration of the court, not merely as strongly corroborating the conclusion to which I have already pointed, but from its own intrinsic importance. At least two of the specifications charge a fact, which, it is presumed, will not be controverted; and the only question which could seriously be contested before this court, would be that now raised,—do the facts therein set forth, constitute offences for which the accused can be made amenable before a military tribunal? It will scarcely be denied, and indeed the counsel for Captain Porter has intimated to me, that the fact of publishing the pamphlet alleged in the second specification, and various instances of the facts averred in the fifth specification, will be admitted. The facts being conceded, not merely by inference of law, but literally, the only question remaining is, do they constitute an offence of which this court can take cognizance. The determination of that question is, at all events, therefore, to that extent, a decision as to the guilt or innocence of the accused. By the oath administered at the organization of the court, the promulgation of the sentence of the court is prohibited to each of its members, and to the judge advocate. If, therefore, this question should now be decided, as merely a collateral one, and that decision not be regarded as a final determination of the case, and as such announced to the Department, the consequence seems inevitable. So much of the sentence of the court as ascertains whether the accused is or is not guilty, is promulgated contrary to the oath which has been taken. These considerations can scarcely have escaped the notice of the very able counsel of the accused; and it is not to be presumed that the consequences which have been pointed out were not anticipated. At all events, the court has been placed in this dilemma by the accused, and upon him must the consequences rest.

I would beg leave respectfully to submit to the consideration of the court, another view of this question, not confined, in its application, to the present case, but of great and general importance. Military tribunals are, as has been conceded by the counsel for the accused, in many essential respects, courts of honor. Many of the charges which it is usual to try before them, involve considerations of infinitely higher moment, to the individual arraigned, than the mere punishment to which, if found guilty, he will be exposed. The honor of an officer in the navy should be infinitely dearer to him than any other consideration. The members of such courts are far better qualified to decide upon questions of this character than upon the subtilties of special pleading or the refinements of verbal criticism. It will be a subject of regret, should it become common in the service, for officers charged with conduct unbecoming their character, involving their personal honor and veracity, to rest their defence upon technical formalities and critical niceties, which, even if allowed to protect them from punishment, will leave them exposed to obloquy and odium as guilty, in point of fact, of what is perhaps in inaccurate language alleged against them. What gratification will it hereafter afford, either to the high-minded honorable gentlemen who usually compose a court-martial, or to the high-minded and honorable associates and companions of one arraigned before them for conduct unbecoming his rank and station, if on the strength of a precedent established by such authority as this tribunal, the accused should be absolved from punishment because the person who drafted the charges has committed a verbal inaccuracy or technical error, which, though it may nullify the charge in point of form, leaves the character of the accused burthened with all the odium which the accusation itself creates, augmented by the tacit admission of guilt which is involved by resting his defence, not upon a denial of the fact, but a nicety of special pleading or a philological criticism.

So long as the members of a court-martial can perceive that the offence charged is couched in language sufficiently perspicuous and precise to apprise the accused of what he is called upon to answer, so long, it is hoped, will they be averse to receive any defence grounded upon mere defects of form. Such tribunals will ever be opposed to trying a brother officer upon charges purposely couched in ambiguous language, calculated to mislead or entrap the accused. While they will be disposed to exact on the part of the prosecution, all information, and every light which can be required by the prisoner fairly and fully to meet and refute the charge, they will be equally indisposed to demand that degree of precision and formality which, while it contributes no aid towards preparing the defence, or guarding against oppression or surprise, only enlarges the field for the display of ingenious and captious criticism.

When such ceases to be the regulating principle of courts-martial, all that now constitutes the pride and honor of the service will be at an end. Officers, instead of devoting their time and attention to their professional duties, instead of cherishing a lofty and chivalrous sense of honor, instead of encouraging that spirit and feeling which, while it confers dignity and magnanimity upon the superior, gives elevation and respect to the inferior in rank, will resort to the quirks and quibbles of the special pleader, the subtle casuistry of the professional logician, or the pedantic refinements of the verbal critic. How far such a change is desirable rests with this court to determine. With great justice has it been remarked that the decisions of this tribunal will be looked to with respect and deference. Precedents here established will be followed hereafter; and great weight will necessarily be attached to every opinion emanating from such high authority. An appeal of a somewhat personal kind was a day or two since made to me. A hope was intimated, and that hope is now enforced by something bearing the appearance of a threat, if not gratified, that the judge advocate would drop the charge to which exception has been taken. It seems to be intimated that an investigation would, or might, disturb the tranquillity or reputation of some eminent and meritorious public functionaries involved in the dispute. Such a step, under these circumstances, would be repugnant to the wishes, and under any, would be wholly beyond the powers, as well as incompatible with the duties of a judge advocate. The charges have been preferred by the government, and by it submitted to this court for adjudication. The power which preferred can alone withdraw the accusation; the tribunal to which it has been referred can alone judicially decide it.

It may, however, be observed that the government cannot be supposed to be tenacious upon this subject, nor is the smallest solicitude felt by the judge advocate as to the decision of this question. Those who alone are interested are the accused and others belonging to the service; and such a decision as is craved may well be deprecated by them. The offences charged are such as the government possesses ample means to punish. It can vindicate its own authority, and protect itself from contumelious or insulting language. Disrespectful conduct and letters to the head of the Navy Department, have heretofore been punished without the instrumentality of a court-martial, and may be again. If this court shall determine that such conduct and such language constitute no offence of which it can take cognizance, the consequences of that decision will be felt, and felt only by those belonging to the service. The government, instead of submitting cases of this description to the determination of such a tribunal, instead of bringing those who have offended before their peers, for a fair and impartial trial, will be compelled by the principle of self preservation to exercise the power which it possesses, of punishing the offenders. The act of submitting this case, therefore, to this court, so far from being a measure at which the accused ought to take exception, should be received by him in the same feeling in which it was done. The only object was to afford him an opportunity of submitting to the impartial determination of his peers, whether any justification, any extenuation, any apology, could be offered for conduct which in itself seemed so highly reprehensible and so deserving of punishment. If this court shall determine that, in point of law, every officer in the navy may, without violating any article of the naval code, and without subjecting himself to punishment before a military tribunal, write disrespectful and insubordinate letters to the President of the United States, and to the Secretary of the Navy; may publish to the world his orders and instructions from the government, and his correspondence with the Department; may publish accurate or inaccurate statements of the proceedings of courts of inquiry, while the same are under advisement of the Executive; may make charges and insinuations, not warranted by the facts, highly disrespectful to the Secretary of the Navy, and the members of a court appointed to investigate his conduct—so let it be. The individual charged by the government with such insubordinate conduct, should be the last to desire to withdraw such an accusation from the decision of his brother officers.

On this occasion, as on all others in which it prefers charges, the government has expressed its opinion that the acts which the accused is alleged to have committed are reprehensible, and deserve punishment. All charges brought before a military tribunal necessarily involve the idea that the person who prefers them conceives the facts set forth to be criminal to the extent in which they are so charged, unless some circumstances of justification or mitigation can be presented. The single object of submitting the charges to the consideration of the court, is to ascertain judicially whether or not he has acted as he is charged with acting, and whether he was justified, by the circumstances in which he was placed, in so acting. In the present instance an opportunity has been afforded to the accused before this high tribunal, of proving that he was authorized to use the language which is accused of being disrespectful; that the assertions and insinuations alleged to be not warranted by the facts were true; and that he was justifiable in the conduct which is charged to be reprehensible. Instead of availing himself of this opportunity, he insists that these allegations, if true, contain no matter to which he can be called upon to answer before a court-martial. He rests his defence upon the law, and by the law his case must be decided.

I shall now proceed briefly to examine the objections both general and particular, that have been urged, and shall endeavor to satisfy the court by reason, by positive enactment, and by precedents of high authority, that this charge, and each and every of the specifications, are sufficient in point of law.

On the present occasion it may be considered as superfluous to disprove the correctness of a general position which has been asserted with so much confidence by the very able counsel for the accused, that no offence can be tried before a court-martial, but one which is specially prohibited by some positive statutory enactment. To show that the learned counsel has been in this particular not quite so accurate as might have been expected from his known accomplishments and varied erudition, I shall beg leave to cite a single passage from an author to whom he has frequently referred. Mr. Tytler, after quoting the 36th section of the British mutiny act, thus proceeds to comment upon its provisions: "Although it follows from these clauses, that no crime which is mentioned and defined by the articles of war, is punishable by a court-martial in any other manner than that which is specially directed by those articles; yet it does not follow that there are no crimes punishable by a court-martial, but such as are enumerated and declared to be punishable by the articles of war."* He then proceeds to show that a court-martial may inflict punishment for any breach of the regulations or orders respecting the army, though nothing touching the same should appear in the mutiny act or articles of war. In the following page he continues: "But there are offences which admit of no precise definition, and yet, which in the military profession, are of the most serious consequence, as weakening and subverting that principle of honor on which the proper discipline of the army must materially depend. Of these, a court-martial, which is in the highest sense a court of honor, are themselves appointed the sole judges, or rather the legislators; for it is in their breasts to define the crime, as well as to award the punishment."

Every officer in the navy, occupies a particular relation with the President of the United States, his commanding officer, by whose appointment, and at whose pleasure he holds his commission. Many instances of crimes of a military character might be enumerated, which are not in terms prohibited by any code of naval law. Many military offences it would be impossible to define, with the same accuracy with which offences at common law are defined. Many are wholly dependent upon the relationship which subsists between the officer and his superior. Among these is insubordination, a term perfectly well understood, both in civil life and in military service. The definition, or rather description of subordination, has been given with great accuracy in one of the works to which the learned counsel has referred, and it will hereafter be particularly cited. Without subordination no service can exist, no discipline be enforced, no harmony preserved. It is peculiarly a military duty, though by no means exclusively so. The general peace of society, the domestic tranquillity of families cannot coexist with insubordination. The general meaning of the term subordination, may be distinctly comprehended, but it would be impossible to enumerate all the cases, much less to describe them with logical accuracy, in which an officer may be guilty of insubordination. The meaning of the term being comprehended, and no soldier can long remain ignorant of its signification or of the necessity for enforcing it, its application to particular cases, must be determined by the sound discretion of the court. In this respect, it is analogous to mutinous conduct, disobedience of orders, &c., which must always and necessarily be equally vague and indefinite, and be equally applicable to a thousand wholly dissimilar actions.

So also, in regard to conduct unbecoming an officer, or as the same idea is frequently expressed in military books, and before military courts, unofficer-like conduct, a form of expression which, though perhaps not found in any vocabulary, is as intelligible as any other in the language. Whether any particular act merits this epithet, can scarcely be a matter of serious doubt among officers whose own characters and demeanor clearly demonstrate that they perfectly well understood in theory, and never omit in practice, a conduct which becomes their rank and station. If doubts on such a question should arise, they will never be solved, nor will the minds of the members of the tribunal whose duty it is to decide them be illuminated, by special pleading or verbal criticism. The instances are numerous in which officers in our own service have been arraigned before military courts for acts which are stigmatized as unbecoming their station, and perhaps it would be difficult to conceive a more complete disqualification for holding a commission, than an actual ignorance of the meaning of these phrases.

The learned counsel, in commenting upon this charge, has alleged that "the conduct imputed to the accused, is characterized by an epithet unknown to our language;" and, after exhausting his critical talents in conjecturing its meaning, he comes, at last, to the conclusion, that the signification to be attached to it, the most favorable to the prosecution, is, that as subordination has, by one single author, been made to signify obedience of orders, insubordination, or insubordinate conduct, must mean disobedience of orders.

Without indulging the idle expectation, that it will be in my power to compete with the ingenious gentleman in his philological researches, or to do full justice to a specimen of verbal criticism, which, however suitable an appendage to the Diversions of Purley, seems to have wandered out of its proper sphere, when it found its way into the proceedings of a court-martial, I must beg the indulgent attention of the court to a few remarks.

One of the most beautiful and philosophic writers, whose works embellish English literature, commenting upon a similar effort of ingenuity, asserts that it proceeds "on a supposition, founded on a total misconception of the nature of the circumstances, which, in the history of language, attach different meanings to the same words, and which, often, by slow and insensible gradations, remove them to such a distance from their primitive or radical sense, that no ingenuity can trace the successive steps of their progress."†

The signification which the learned counsel has quoted and attributed to the words subordinate and subordination is unobjectionable. I shall, however, show that they are employed by high authorities in a sense perfectly appropriate to the present occasion.

In the report made by General Scott, containing a system of field service and police, submitted to Congress December 26, 1820, p. 50, and approved by that body, in giving his definition of discipline, he attaches to it this meaning: "correction, or the enforcement of subordination; the award and infliction of punishment consequent on a breach of that subordination, that is, consequent on a neglect or breach of some duty."

In the present military code it is repeatedly, it is believed, employed in the same, or closely analogous sense. In Duane's Military Dictionary, quoted by the learned counsel, it is thus described: "A perfect submission to the order of superiors; a perfect dependence, regulated by the rights and duties of every military man, from the soldier to the general. Subordination should show the spirit of the chief in all the members; and this single idea, which is manifest to the dullest apprehension, suffices to show its importance. Without subordination it is impossible that a corps can support itself; that its motions can be directed, order established, or the service carried on. In effect, it is subordination that gives a soul and harmony to the service; it adds strength to authority, and merit to obedience; and while it secures the efficacy of command, reflects honor upon its execution. It is subordination which prevents every disorder, and procures every advantage to an army."

In the same sense is the word employed in the first article of the rules and regulations for the government of the navy. "The commanders of all ships and vessels of war are strictly enjoined and required to show in themselves a good example of virtue, honor, patriotism, and subordination."

In the 2d vol. of Marshall's Life of Washington, p. 245–6, that eminent authority remarks: "The army was consequently found in a state of almost entire disorganization, and the difficulty of establishing the necessary principles of order and subordination, always considerable among raw troops, was greatly increased by the short terms for which enlistments had been made."

In a letter from General Washington to Governor Henry, of Virginia, Note XIX, at the end of the same volume he says "discipline and subordination add life and vigor to military movements."

If the signification of this term should be considered as ascertained by the foregoing citations, which have been introduced, for the purpose as well of showing the military sense of the term, as the high importance of the military duty of subordination, it would, perhaps, be unnecessary to consume time in showing, by reference to equally high authorities, the meaning of the word, and the dangerous character of insubordination. It might be sufficient to quote from Dr. Johnson's preface to his dictionary a single passage, to show why this term is not found in any vocabulary of our language, if such indeed be the fact. That learned lexicographer observes: "of some forms of composition, such as that by which re is prefixed to denote repetition, and un to signify contrariety or privation, all the examples cannot be accumulated, because the use of these particles, if not wholly arbitrary, is so little limited that they are hourly affixed to new words, as occasion requires, or is imagined to require them."

I shall, however, cite a few examples of the use, as they will serve to show the signification of the word.

The chief justice, in his 2d volume of his Life of Washington, p. 327, speaking of the character of the American troops at an early period of the revolutionary struggle, observes: "A spirit of insubordination seemed to pervade the whole mass." In page 366, referring to the condition of the American army in Canada, under the command of General Sullivan, he observes: "The whole were in a state of total insubordination."

The word is employed repeatedly by the very able and accomplished gentleman who prepared, as counsel, the defence of Lieut. Kennon. In p. 75 of the report of that case, he says: "Do not believe I am an advocate for insubordination. If one expression of that character can be found in my letter, I merit punishment and will patiently endure it." In p. 88: "The testimonial which this court has deigned to afford me by their evidence permits me to say, and to say proudly, that I have never dishonored it by one act of insubordination or the smallest departure from duty." In p. 91: "Discipline is exposed to two foes, coming from opposite quarters, and assailing it at different points. Insubordination, which, founded on man's natural impatience of control, often leads the inferior to resist necessary authority, &c." Again, in the same page: "If insubordination, in its restlessness, has sometimes raised its arm against rightful authority, &c." And in p. 92: "I venture to anticipate such a decision as will remove this unfounded opinion, maintain the true discipline of the navy, and convince all grades of service that, though insubordination will always receive its merited punishment, oppression will find neither countenance nor impunity." On the same trial, the sentence of the court, drawn up by the judge advocate, bearing the same name with the learned counsel, whose ingenious criticisms have given occasion to this, I fear tedious, examination, and, as I understand, nearly allied to him, contains this sentence: "The court cannot, by its silence, give sanction to sentiments which, though clothed in the mantle of defence, are calculated to infuse principles of insubordination in the navy."

A single reference to an English work will be sufficient. Mr. Tytler, whose learning has been highly commended, and whose authority has been recognized by the learned counsel, in p. 86–7, of his treatise, says, speaking of Cromwell: "Finding that the whole army would be speedily in a state of anarchy and total insubordination, he determined, by a daring exertion of power, to remedy this alarming disorder."

After these citations, I feel myself fully warranted in saying, that if the word insubordination had been employed instead of the phrase insubordinate conduct, no possible exception could have been taken to it, either as "a solecism in language," or indefinite in its signification. I will respectfully submit to the court whether it is possible even for the microscopic perceptions of the learned counsel to distinguish the difference between them. The signification of both is the same, and the obvious meaning to be attached to either form of expression is, such conduct as is wholly unsuitable to the relation which subsists between the person guilty of it, and his superior in rank and authority.

As has been already intimated, my object in multiplying quotations, has been not merely to show the propriety and legitimacy of the expression employed in this charge, but also to establish the next position upon which I shall proceed to make an additional remark, that subordination is a high military duty, and insubordination a high military offence. It has been shown that, by the first article of the regulations for the government of the navy, all commanders of vessels, &c., are strictly enjoined to show in themselves a good example of virtue, honor, patriotism, and subordination. Why this injunction, if those to whom the example is set are not bound to follow it? if insubordination or insubordinate conduct be not a military offence? To require that the military law should specially enjoin subordination, or prohibit insubordinate conduct, would be as wise as to require that a particular statute should be passed, specially forbidding the violation of any law, and requiring obedience to law. Every citizen, independently of special enactment to that effect, by entering into the social compact, by the very act of becoming a member of the community, engages to obey the laws of that society to which he has attached himself. In like manner, every soldier, by connecting himself with the service, assumes upon himself the obligation to perform the military duty of subordination.

A man accused before a court of common law, or before a court-martial, of treason or murder, may with equal show of reason demand to have the particular statute pointed out, which prohibits these high offences. None such can be produced. In the law of God is found the prohibition, "Thou shalt do no murder:" it has not been introduced into any statutory code of social or municipal law, with which I am acquainted. The prohibition in them is tacit; the offence is described, and the punishment affixed.

It is said, however, that the language of this charge is too vague and equivocal; that it does not apprise the accused of what he is called upon to answer. Numerous authorities have been cited to enforce and illustrate this position. A reference to them will show, that the learned counsel has required far more minuteness of detail than is warranted by any writer upon military law, or by the practice of courts-martial. Tytler, in the passage read by the learned counsel, p. 213, speaking of the only instance in which the British military code enjoins a particular specification, says: "It might, perhaps, be argued that in other crimes such specification is not essentially necessary; and it must be owned that, in practice, it has been too frequently dispensed with, and a general charge allowed, as of mutiny, disobedience of orders, disrespectful conduct to superior officers, &c. But the generality of such charge, although it may not be absolutely reprobated by the military law, or amount to an avoidance or annulling of the indictment, affords, in every case, a competent and weighty objection upon the part of the accused, which he may urge, to the effect of having the charge rendered special, by a pointed detail of the particular facts on which it is founded." The same idea, in the same language, may also be found in McComb's Treatise. From this passage, it clearly appears that a prisoner may be arraigned before a court-martial upon a general charge of mutinous conduct, disobedience of orders, and the like, without any specification; that such generality of language does not vitiate or annul the indictment, as it has been termed; and that the only course by which the accused can remedy or guard against the inconvenience to which he may be thereby subjected, is to require of the prosecutor particularly to specify the facts which he intends to prove by testimony. In the present instance, therefore, the accused would be unable to succeed in his present application to the court, if the charge had been as general as it now is, and unaccompanied by any specification of the circumstances in which the alleged criminality consists. If he apprehended inconvenience, or surprise, he might have applied to the court to require such detail, before he undertook to plead to the charges.

The learned counsel has indeed intimated that this cannot be done in this country, because one of the articles for the better government of the navy, prohibits any alteration in the charges, after the same have been furnished to the accused. To this remark, two very sufficient and conclusive answers present themselves. First. The statement of the prosecutor, under the order of the court, of the particular evidence by which he designs to substantiate the general charge, neither is an alteration of such charge, nor does it require such alteration to be made; it is a wholly intrinsic act. Secondly. This provision is made for the sole protection of the accused, and no principle of law is more clearly settled, than that any one may renounce the benefit of a statutory provision designed for his own advantage. If, then, the accused had called for such a detail, as Mr. Tytler says he may, and the court had deemed the present a case in which he was entitled to a more particular specification of the facts designed to be given in evidence, such detail might have been furnished without any violation of the law. It is understood that precedents of this kind exist in our own service; and if none has yet been established, it would have furnished no valid exception to the application.

I shall now briefly proceed to cite a few cases in which this generality of charge has been allowed without exception. In the case of Captain Shaw, the second charge was "unofficer-like and ungentleman-like conduct." In the case of Sailing Master James B. Wright, the charge was "unofficer-like conduct." In the case of Lieutenant Benjamin Richardson, the charge was "conduct unbecoming an officer and gentleman." In the case of Sailing Master Daniel Dobbins, the charge was "ungentlemanly and unofficer-like conduct." In the case of Midshipman Payne, the first charge was "defamation of character;" and the second, "unofficer-like, ungentleman-like, and scandalous conduct." These cases are sufficient to show that such a charge as has been preferred in the present instance, is as well established by precedent in our own service, as I have shown it to be by a reference to writers on military law, of the highest authority and respectability.

It is, however, to take an imperfect and incorrect view of this question, to consider the charge as perfectly insulated, and standing by itself. Connected with the specifications, which point out the particular instances in which the conduct of the accused is alleged to be insubordinate, and unbecoming an officer, he could scarcely have been induced to suppose that the particular dress in which he might choose to appear, the fashion of wearing his sword or hat, or the other minor directions from fashion, or the common routine of society, to which reference has been sportively and facetiously made, could have been intended as the particular instances in which he had rendered himself amenable to this charge. All the vagueness and indistinctiveness alluded to by the counsel, vanish when a reference is made to the particular facts stated in the specifications of this charge. It is not by the charge alone, but by the charge accompanied by the specifications, that this point is to be determined.

To these specifications I shall now recur, and submit to the consideration of the court a few remarks upon the particular exceptions that have been urged against them.

The first specification charges the accused with writing, and transmitting to the President of the United States, and to the Secretary of the Navy, the letters therein referred to, which are alleged to be of an insubordinate and disrespectful character, thereby violating the respect due from every officer in the Navy to the head of the Department, impairing the discipline of the service, and setting a most dangerous and pernicious example.

It is objected to this specification, that it does not set out the language alleged to be disrespectful, and that it does not charge any offence cognizable before a court-martial. It is somewhat singular that such an exception should now, for the first time, be presented to the consideration of a court-martial. In the case of Lieutenant Abbot, the third specification is in the following words: "In that he did, during the time, on the station aforesaid, on or about the 11th day of August last past, address a letter to the Secretary of the Navy, covering a communication written in his own handwriting, or by his direction and request, containing numerous false, scandalous, and malicious charges, against his superior officer, Captain Isaac Hull, calculated to deprive the said Captain Hull of his honorable fame." Here a letter is referred to by its date only, as containing charges of a very serious character against the individual therein mentioned, but not a word of that letter is recited in the specification. The charge and specifications, in that case, were drawn up and signed by Captain Porter, in his official character as Navy Commissioner. The court, consisting of members, of whose intelligence and capacity, it would, on this occasion, be indelicate to speak, as three of them are now sitting on this case, tried Lieutenant Abbot, found him guilty, and sentenced him to be punished on this specification. Neither the accused, nor the very eminent counsel concerned in his behalf, William Sullivan and Samuel M. Knapp, Esquires, ever conceived that it was necessary to set forth those passages in the letters, which were deemed reprehensible; and it escaped the observation of the Secretary of the Navy, now one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States. If the objection in the present case is sustainable, with how much propriety and force might it not then have been urged? So, in the case of Lieutenant Kennon, in which also the same prosecutor preferred the charges, and, on the trial of which, three of the members of the present court sat, the first specification charged the accused in a still more vague and general manner than Captain Porter is now charged, "by falsely and maliciously publishing, in the Norfolk and Portsmouth Herald, of the 13th of December, and in the column dated the 12th of the same month, a letter purporting to be from me to him, when I never wrote such a letter." It is true that all objections arising out of defects of form, are, on that occasion, distinctly waived by the accused, who rested his defence exclusively upon the broad denial of the fact, but no intimation was given by any one that such a specification was deficient in that particular. So in the case of Midshipman Payne, under the general charge before mentioned of "defamation of character," the specification was, "that he did, on or about the 2d of September, 1821, send or deliver to Commodore Jones a letter, containing a number of charges, charging Midshipman Purveyance with theft, cowardice, and other disgraceful acts." In all these cases, whether because such an exception never occurred to the accused as sustainable, or because they preferred meeting the charge on the broad basis of fact, no such technical objections were urged. These now constitute precedents of high authority, and their weight is increased by the high rank of the accuser in the two first cases, the exalted character of the court by which they were tried, and the eminent abilities and legal erudition of the counsel employed by the accused.

The second specification contains the charge of publishing to the world what purports to be the proceedings of the court of inquiry, without the authority of the Executive. Whether an officer is not guilty of insubordinate conduct, and conduct unbecoming his station, in making an appeal to the nation, and endeavoring to prepossess the community with the merits of his case, and to forestall public opinion while that case is undergoing the examination and consideration of the Executive, may be submitted to this or any other tribunal. The pernicious consequences that may result from such a step cannot escape the notice of the most superficial observer, and can scarcely be exaggerated in the imagination of the most timid.

If this be reprehensible and erroneous, still more must it be to publish an inaccurate report of such proceedings. Whether such inaccuracies be deemed trivial or important, is a matter of subordinate consideration. The liability to fall into error, though inadvertently, affords one of the most conclusive reasons to show the impropriety of any such unauthorized publication.

It is, however, alleged that the inaccuracies should have been specified. The authority of Tytler has been already referred to, for the purpose of showing that a charge is not vitiated by being couched in general language, and unaccompanied with any specification, and the inference is irresistible that, if a specification is made, it is not an essential defect that it does not specify the particular inaccuracies which are contained in a publication specially referred to. The first specification in the case of Lieutenant Abbot, prepared by Captain Porter, is in the following words: "In that, moved by a spirit of envy or base motive, he hath, upon the Boston station, and within a year now last past, scandalously attempted to take from his superior officer, Captain Isaac Hull, his good name." The second: "In that he has, during the time, and on the station aforesaid, made numerous scandalous and false insinuations against the official character and conduct of his superior officer, Captain Isaac Hull, calculated to stamp his name with opprobrium and infamy." In the second specification in the case of Lieut. Kennon, the accused is charged with "having, within a year, last past, maliciously used base means for defaming my character, to wit: by publishing, or causing to be published, in the Norfolk and Portsmouth Herald, a statement bearing his name, containing falsehoods which were calculated to injure my character, and which he permitted to remain without being publicly contradicted, until his attention was drawn to the subject, by the remarks in a Georgia paper." "By repeated attacks made by him on me, in the public newspapers, and by falsely declaring in the Herald, that he never made me a reluctant apology, and publicly recalling it after he had obtained all the advantages resulting from a reluctant apology made to me." "By having used towards me, in a public print, a term which is seldom applied to other than pickpockets, rogues, gamblers, &c." Surely if these specifications are not utterly illegal, from their vagueness and generality, from the looseness of their references, and the uncertainty as to the real ground of accusation, those now under consideration must be beyond reproach. The sufficiency of those charges is established by the authority of Captain Porter, who drew them—of the court which tried the accused upon them—of the Department which directed such trial, and approved the proceedings in both cases.

The fourth specification is supported by the same high authority.

The fifth admits of reference to precedents to support it equally unobjectionable. I shall cite but two. In the case of Captain Shaw, already referred to, the accused was found guilty of so much of the eighth specification as alleges "that Captain Shaw, contrary to his duty as an officer, did expose to view, and suffer Chaplain Cheever Felch, and other officers of the navy, to examine and peruse his official communications with the Navy Department. For this offence he was punished. If that be a military offence, cognizable before, and punishable by a court-martial, how far more reprehensible is it to submit orders and instructions from the government, not merely to one or two brother officers, but to publish them to the world, through the medium of a pamphlet and the public gazettes. I shall trouble the court with a reference to but one more authority on this point; it will be found in the thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth pages of the report of the trial of Lieut. Kennon, where it will appear that Captain Porter, under examination as a witness, expresses his decided opinion, that it is highly improper to publish orders received, even from a superior officer in the service, and that he would not commit such an act.

The foregoing references are so completely decisive upon another point raised by the accused on this occasion, viz: that this specification is vicious, inasmuch as it embraces so large a period of time, within which the offence is charged to have been committed, that it will be unnecessary to examine that question further. In both the cases of Lieutenants Abbot and Kennon, the offences are charged to have been committed "within a year now last past." In the present case this specification charges the publications to have been made between the first day of October, 1824, and the fifteenth day of June, 1825. If, in the cases cited, the specifications were right, in this they cannot be wrong.

It will not be denied that the language of our naval code is, in some respects, loose, vague and inaccurate; and that the defects of the system are numerous and important. Vague and inaccurate, however, as it confessedly is, it contains one sweeping clause, sufficiently comprehensive to embrace this charge, and each and every of the specifications under it. "All crimes, committed by persons belonging to the navy, which are not specified in the foregoing articles, shall be punished according to the laws and customs in such cases at sea." This section is a legislative recognition, that there may be crimes committed by persons belonging to the navy, not specially embraced in any of the navy articles; and such are to be punished, as I understand the latter clause of the section, by the instrumentality and at the discretion of a court-martial. Such cases are those in which, to use the language of Tytler, the court assumes the functions "both of legislators and judges."

Before the court shall determine that the charge and specifications in the present case are vicious, for want of form and fullness of detail, I must beg it to pause and to consider what it is that is required. What, if these objections are valid, would be requisite to free the proceedings from their force? In the first specification, it would be necessary to set out all the letters therein referred to by date, being five in number, and some of them of considerable length. In the second, the entire pamphlet published by the accused, must have been introduced, because that is specially referred to. In the third, the real proceedings of the courts of inquiry should have been set out, and the variances between them and the publication distinctly pointed out. In the fourth, it would be required that all the remarks, statements and insinuations, disrespectful to the secretary and the court of inquiry, should have been introduced verbatim; and in the fifth, that all the papers therein referred to, should appear in the charges. Such is the length to which these objections extend.

If this were necessary or even useful in assisting the accused in defending himself from the charge, if it were required by positive law, or enjoined by the practice of courts-martial, no objection to such a requisition ought to be listened to. When, however, the positive law is silent on the subject, when, as has been shown, the practice is wholly different, when no one reason has been or can be assigned, why this should be done, this court can scarcely hesitate to declare that the ground assumed by the accused is wholly untenable.

It may not be necessary to refer to objections which were incidentally urged by the counsel when he, to use his own form of expression, enunciated his ideas upon this subject, but which are not very zealously pressed. It was understood they had been waived, but if so, for what purpose they are again and again recurred to, is not distinctly perceived. I allude to the objection that the accused was not furnished with a copy of the charges upon which he was to be tried, and with a list of the witnesses that would be adduced against him. The accused did intimate at the opening of the court, when he was arraigned upon this trial, that he had not been furnished by the government with a copy of the charges to which he was now called to answer, and did solemnly call upon the court to furnish him with such copy. It did, however, appear upon his own exhibition, that he had been regularly furnished at the proper time and in proper form with a paper, which, with the exception of two letters in one of the words, was a literal transcript of the charges that had been read. In giving the date of one of the letters alleged to be insubordinate and disrespectful, the copying clerk had inadvertently dated it the thirtieth instead of the thirteenth of April. No other variance has been, or it is believed can be, discovered.

As regards the right of the accused to have a list of the witnesses furnished him, it is wholly denied. That such a doctrine is laid down by some of the writers on courts-martial is conceded, and probably this practice may prevail in the army to some extent, but it is apprehended that it is wholly unknown to the navy practice, and the high authority of Sir Charles Morgan, the distinguished judge advocate general of Great Britain, is decidedly against it. In page twelve of the advertisement to the third edition of Tytler, that experienced gentleman says: "I have never understood it to be the duty of the judge advocate in all cases to furnish a prisoner, previous to the trial, with the names and designations of the witnesses, by whose testimony any act objected against him is expected to be proved; nor on the other hand, do I consider that it is requisite for the prisoner to furnish the judge advocate with the names of any other witnesses than those whom he wishes to be officially summoned. I think such communications might possibly in some instances lead to inconvenience on either side." The navy articles are wholly silent upon this subject. They require that he shall be furnished with a copy of the charges and specifications, but do not enjoin that he shall be furnished with a list of the witnesses. At all events when the objection is formally presented, it will be time to discuss and decide upon its validity.

Upon the whole I submit, with great respect, to the court my clear and unhesitating opinion that each and every one of the specifications, as well as the charge, are sufficient both in substance and in form; that they do specify offences of a military character for which the aecused may be arraigned and tried before a court-martial.

It is to be regretted that such a discussion should thus prematurely have been required. Every objection now taken could have been taken with equal efficacy and propriety in the defence. It would then have been analogous to the motion in criminal courts to arrest the judgment. The argument into which I have thus unexpectedly, and with very limited opportunities for research and consideration been driven, this full and distinct enunciation of my opinion, and the premature decision of half the case by the court would have been postponed to a more suitable period. The course pursued by the accused has, however, imposed upon me an arduous and responsible task, and I should feel myself unworthy of the situation which I occupy, before this court, were I to shrink from the discharging of any duty, however unpleasant or however irksome.

DEFENCE.

Mr. President and gentlemen of the court-martial:

After having endured a long and mortifying suspense, the frown of undefined indignation, and the anxieties of ambiguous censure, I have experienced a sensible relief, from a public investigation promising a determinate issue; which, in no event, can place me in a situation less tolerable than that from which it takes me. Even the hard measure that has been dealt me, in the manner and spirit of the prosecution, both before and during the progress of my present trial, is amply compensated, whatever be the event, by the opportunity afforded me, of a full and open justification before the world; and especially, before a tribunal between the members of which and myself, at least so much of intelligence and community of sentiment exists, as to free me from the apprehension of receiving less than justice at their hands; and to acquit me, in their minds, from the suspicion of appealing to their favor, for any thing more than justice. If preparatory censures have tended to wound my feelings, or to prejudice my cause; if a stern and jealous inquisition, have probed every part of my professional character and conduct, where the sensitiveness of a man of honor, or the presumed defects of human frailty, might be supposed to shrink from the searching point; and if taken unawares by the suddenness of the attack, or the novelty of my situation, an excruciated sensibility may, for the time, have broke through the guards, that should have preserved me unmoved and self-balanced in mind and temper; yet, after all, I bow, with humility and experimental conviction to the moral system of compensations, that bringeth good out of evil: for innocence, made but the more manifest and clear, from the severity of its trials, is the bright reversion, that might have animated hope, and endued me with the passive fortitude of endurance, through a longer and more penal term of tribulation.

The accusations, which I am now to answer, present this singular feature: while they branch out into two distinct classes of offence, the most dissimilar and the most unequal, in the quality and degree of the legal and moral guilt imputed, as in the importance and interest, to the community, of the principles involved, and of the actions to be condemned or justified; they all originate in the same source; and are closely connected by the causes, that have produced them, and by the passions and motives that uphold them.

The first branch of the accusation brings into discussion the most important and vital principles of the high and awful sanctions, by which national sovereignty is to be maintained and vindicated by arms: while the second hinges upon the minute punctilios of ceremonious respect. That a devoted servant of the republic, who had consumed the flower of his years, and the vigor of his life in arduous, and, as he hoped, acceptable services; who had looked for approbation, if not honor, as his reward, for an unstinted exposure to labors, privations and dangers; so much the more disinterested, as, however beneficial to his country, and to mankind, it promised few of the personal gratifications, which may laudably be sought in the renown of more striking and brilliant achievements; who was conscious of having acted with the most implicit respect and exact fidelity, to what he understood to be the views and instructions of his superiors; who, with wasted powers of life, but untiring activity and zeal, had exerted, for the fulfillment of those instructions, to the utmost scope of their letter and spirit, whatsoever of efficient energy, a constitution worn and broken in the public service, had left him; that such an one should have been somewhat sore and impatient under rebuke, that came like a portent and a wonder, upon his astonished senses, was far more natural than that complaints of misconstruction and injustice should have been interpreted into disrespect; and free, but decorous remonstrance treated as little less than mutiny.

In my justification against these charges, I must regret the necessity of occupying a larger portion of the valuable time of this court, than any intrinsic difficulties in the questions themselves might possibly have acquired. But the terms in which the charges have been framed, their often complained of vagueness and uncertainty, as to the nature and degree of the offence intended to be charged—the mystery observed as to the applications of the facts and circumstances given in the evidence, to the gist of the accusation; and the defect of any advertisement of the points intended to be insisted on, in the prosecution, or that were supposed to require elucidation in the defence: all these circumstances compel me to traverse a wide field, as well of conjectural as of obvious justification.

Before I proceed to discuss any matter of fact or law, put in issue by the first charge, it may be useful to obtain as distinct an understanding, as practicable of its terms, and of the nature and degree of the guilt imputed by it.

The general head under which the offence intended to be charged is classed and characterized, consists of two members: first, "disobedience of orders;" second, "conduct unbecoming an officer." The first doubtless falls under a general description of military offence, common to every organized body of military force in the world; but, in every military code, by which such an offence may be punished, the character and functions of the officer, from whom the orders are supposed to emanate, and the nature of such orders are usually defined with all reasonable precision. In the 5th and 14th of our naval articles of war, this species of offence is defined, in terms nearly equivalent to the corresponding articles in the naval and military codes of Britain,* and in our own military articles of war.† Our 5th naval article of war, in the terms restricted to the orders of a commanding officer, when preparing for, or joining in, or actually engaged in battle. But the 14th article, conceived in terms somewhat more comprehensive, enacts that "no officer or private shall disobey the lawful orders of his superior officer, or strike him, &c., while in the execution of the duties of his office." The punishment of the offence, in either of its modes or degrees, is "death, or such other punishment as a court-martial shall inflict." Then, if by the "disobedience of others," here charged, be intended any offence known to the naval articles of war, and punishable under them, it implies that I had received, from some superior officer, in actual command, either while engaged or about to be engaged in battle, or otherwise "in the execution of the duties of his office," some order which I had disobeyed, and so had come within the danger of a capital offence, as every military offence is denominated, which is punishable either with death or cashiering, though it be left to the discretion of a court-martial to inflict any less punishment. When this general charge comes to be deduced into particulars, in the form of a specification, no orders, either commanding or forbidding me to do any act whatever, are set forth, either in terms or in substance. No commanding or superior officer, from whom they are supposed to have issued, is either named or described. The specification simply sets out the naked and insulated fact, of a certain invasion, by force of arms, upon the territorial sovereignty of Spain, accompanied by divers of acts of hostility against the subjects and the property of that power; and instead of any averment that, in so doing, the orders of a commanding or superior officer had been disobeyed, the conclusion of the specification branches out into a "contravention of the Constitution of the United States, and of the law of nations, and a violation of instructions from the government of the United States." Now whether any "contravention of the Constitution or of the law of nations," not involved in a disobedience of military orders, be an offence cognizable, under this charge, by a court-martial; or whether general instructions from the government be identical with the orders of a commanding or superior officer; and a violation of such instructions equivalent to a disobedience of such orders; are questions of grave import; and will doubtless, in their due order, receive the deliberate consideration of the court. At present, however, we are endeavoring to ascertain the essential character and terms of the offence, actually intended to be charged; its legal attributes and consequences may be separately considered.

* McArthur, p. 275; art. 11, p. 277; art. 22, p. 278; Mutiny act, sec. 1, p 279; Military, art. 3, 4, 5.

As to the second member of the general charge, "conduct unbecoming an officer," whether it be intended to describe a mere incident to every act of military disobedience, or to impute some gratuitous and superadded circumstance of aggravation, on the mode and degree of it; and to inflame the guilt of simple disobedience, by some wanton abuse in the manner and circumstances attending the commission of the act, as in the "divers acts of hostility," said to have been committed "against the subjects and property of the King of Spain," are questions left in the characteristic obscurity, and uncertainty, which have veiled the "head and front of my offending," from any distinct view of it, that might have enabled me to perceive or to divine its extent.

I shall hold myself, however, completely dispensed from any obligation or necessity, to pursue further the labyrinths, into which this indefinite member of the charge might lead us: since, I think, if any proposition can be made clear by human evidence, it would be impossible, for the most vindictive accuser, to find any pretext, in the facts of this case, for pushing the charge beyond a simple departure from the letter or spirit of the positive rule of action, supposed to have been prescribed to me; whether it be the Constitution of the United States, or the law of nations, or any instructions that establish the law or rule which I an supposed to have "contravened," or "violated." If I have offended at all, it is in the single transgression of that law or rule: "the head and front of my offending hath that extent—no more." I shall, therefore, leave it to the court, without further remark, to decide, from the evidence, whether it were possible to have conducted a military operation on neutral territory, with a more scrupulous regard to all the rights of person and property, which such an operation could, in the nature of things, have left inviolate. If the act were unlawful in itself, I must abide the consequence; but it lies not, I think, within the compass of human ingenuity or malice, to contend, that the act, as being either lawful in itself, was stripped of its legal sanctions, and had its quality of lawful changed to unlawful; or, as a sheer trespass, that it was inflamed beyond its intrinsic character and degree, by any wanton aggravations or abuses, in the manner and circumstances.

The question then is presented in the simple form: whether the act complained of were, under the circumstances and inducements that led to it, an infraction, either of the Constitution of the United States, or of the law of nations, or of my instructions from the Government of the United States; and, in that order I proceed to consider it.

Whether a belligerent operation, in the course of an authorized war, be constitutional or not, is a question which, if it have any significancy, or be capable of any solution, may be considered as nearly identical with the other question suggested by this charge, namely: whether it be consonant to the law of nations, supposing the law, here intended, to consist of the conventional or customary rules, by which civilized nations have agreed to control, and mitigate the ferocity and the calamities incident to a state of war, and which constitute what is called the law of war. All that the Constitution of the United States has to do with the matter is, that it has communicated to the general government the unqualified jurisdiction of war and peace. The power to carry on war, offensive or defensive, involves, in its terms, every right, immediately or remotely, incidental to that state and condition of human society.

In what these incidental rights consist, must be determined by the known or necessary conditions and consequences of war. Whatever of these the most comprehensive signification of the term may embrace, are necessarily constitutional; but the law of war, as it is called, is, in many respects, so vague, and so dependent upon arbitrary views of necessity or expediency, to be judged of by hostile parties, and to be justified by an infinite and incalculable variety of peculiar circumstances, that it scarce furnishes a definite or intelligible rule, by which it may be predicated, of any military operation, that it is either constitutional or unconstitutional. The only constitutional question, therefore, is, whether the war itself were authorized; that is, whether commenced or carried on by that authority to which the Constitution has exclusively delegated this high power.

This brings us to the consideration of the second test, which, it is suggested, should be applied to my conduct, on the occasion in question; and that is the law of nations.

That branch of public law, which determines the correlative rights and duties either of the hostile belligerents, as between themselves, or of neutrals and belligerents, as between themselves; or of allies or co-belligerents, as between themselves, constitutes a voluminous code, which is, perhaps, the theme of as much undeterminate controversy, both as to its principles and its authority, as any that ever undertook to prescribe rules of human conduct; and it would scarce be practicable to deduce from it any definite rule, applicable to the infinitely varied circumstances of actual war; and by which a military officer might be condemned, for a presumed violation of the law. In this case, however, it is not necessary to trouble the court with any reference to the more recondite and theoretical definitions of general rules; because, in so far as my conduct depends, for its justification, upon such rules, it may be referred to an authoritative and practical exposition of them, as applicable to the particular circumstances under which I acted. The rights and duties incidental to a state of war, as it affects every party directly or indirectly concerned, have been the subject of such frequent and elaborate discussion, in our intercourse with foreign nations, and have received such lucid definition and such various illustration from our most eminent statesmen, that we may be said to have compiled and digested, from the best authorities, and the most enlightened views of the subject, a system of public law, upon these topics, which, if it be not generally adopted by the family of civilized nations, as the moral and political influence of our example extends, may, at least, be received, among ourselves, as superseding, to every practical purpose, a reference to the more general and less applicable doctrines of elementary writers. Our discussions with the powers of Europe, while they were belligerent and we were neutral, have settled, for ourselves, the positive rights of neutrals; and our more recent discussions and collisions with one of those powers, while we were belligerent and she neutral, have equally well settled the positive duties of neutrals. The rule to be deduced from the latter is so much the more intelligible in its doctrine, and obvious and practical in its application, since it has grown out of collisions and discussions of the belligerent rights of the United States, as correlative to the neutral duties of this very power, Spain, whose territorial sovereignty I am charged with having violated; and more especially of her neutral duties, as determined by the peculiar circumstances of her colonial dependencies—in one of which the scene of my supposed trangression is laid.

The right of a belligerent, in the prosecution of a lawful war, to involve in all the practical consequences of war such parties as, not being enemies, assist the enemy by active or passive co-operation, has been so clearly expounded in the doctrines of public law, and illustrated in the history and practice of our own government, as to leave but little to be said on that subject at this day. Whatsoever ground of controversy may remain, as to the extreme limits or necessary modifications of the rule, depends upon principles entirely foreign to any question applicable to the present case. In so far as the doctrine or practice is now in question, it is placed beyond doubt or controversy by the concurring authority of all the most approved expounders of public law; and, above all, of our wisest statesmen, who have been called upon so frequently to unfold its principles, and apply them, in practice, to the actual condition and relations of the country.

The actual extent of the correlative rights and duties of such parties, and the circumstances that may justify the treatment of them as enemies, are, in some degree, determined by their relative position, either as strictly neutral, or as allies embarked in a common cause; the positive duties of the latter being, of course, increased both in number and obligation, and many acts permitted to a neutral being unlawful in an ally.

If a neutral, through perfidy, partiality, or weakness, (and it is perfectly immaterial which,) permit, or be compelled, by superior force, to suffer his territory to be seized by one belligerent, or, in any manner, used to the annoyance of another, the latter has a perfect right to invade that territory, and use it, and all the means and facilities of war that it affords, to the same extent that his adversary is permitted to use, or has, by force, usurped the same. The territory, the inhabitants, and whatsoever else there may be there, which have been thus converted into means of our annoyance, are, for the time, impressed with the character of enemy, and may be treated accordingly.

It is one of most ordinary and undisputed and least harsh of these rights, to pursue an enemy into neutral territory, if he retreat there for refuge, or take his station there to be ready to sally forth and attack his adversary, as occasion and opportunity may serve. If this abuse of neutral territory proceed from the weakness of the sovereign, and his inability to protect it from violation, the rule is, that at the point and in the degree that his authority ceases to be exerted, with practical efficacy, that of the party injured by its relaxation commences and extends. In the emphatic language of Mr. Adams, "the right of the United States can as little compound with impotence as with perfidy." All this infers no hostility against the neutral, but proceeds upon the great principle of self defence, which justifies a belligerent to disarm his adversary, turn upon him his own weapons, and deprive him of the permitted or usurped means of annoyance. There may be occasions where the misconduct of a neutral sovereign might expose him to the resentment of the belligerent sovereign, and make him an actual party to the war; but I here speak merely of those incidental rights of actual war, which affect him in his neutral character, and require not the decision of the sovereign will to authorize the enforcement of them, which are inseparable from belligerent operations, and are summarily exerted in the exigency of the moment at the discretion of the commander to whom the conduct of such operations is entrusted. "Of the necessity for which (says Mr. Adams, speaking of the invasion and occupation, by military forces, of neutral territory, including its fortified places and garrisons, whenever the effectual prosecution of hostilities against the enemy shall in the opinion of the general make it necessary) he has the most effectual means of forming a judgment, and the vindication of which is written in every page of the law of nations, as well as in the first law of nature, self defence."*

The principle is not confined to neutral territory, but extends to all the ramifications of neutral sovereignty, and to all the modifications of neutral property; for it is the same identical principle modified by circumstances, that authorizes naval commanders, from the admiral of a fleet to a lieutenant commandant of a schooner or a barge, or even the captain of a privateer, to seize upon the high seas, neutral ships carrying contraband, infringing a blockade, or committing other unneutral acts. In these cases the ships seized are good prize, but like the territory, (of which they are an emanation of sovereignty) they are also liable to temporary seizure and detention, as when found laden with enemy property. This practical exertion of belligerent rights upon the high seas, is in principle just as high-handed an interference with the exclusive domain of foreign sovereignty, in order to repel open or insidious hostility in neutral guise and by neutral means, as any analogous invasion or occupation of the actual territory of the same sovereign. The flag of a nation is just as inviolable an emblem of sovereignty as territory; and the ship that bears it, is constructively a part of the territory, and just as much entitled to protection.

"There will need (to borrow again the language of Mr. Adams, the condensation and force of which may dispense with other illustration) no citations from printed treatises on international law, to prove the correctness of this principle. It is engraven in adamant on the common sense of mankind; no writer upon the laws of nations ever pretended to contradict it; none of any reputation or authority ever omitted to insert it."

I cannot forbear, however, adding to the domestic documents of our public transactions, by which both our belligerent and our neutral rights are so amply unfolded and accurately defined, the authority of the venerable and illustrious Grotius, who may be styled the father of the modern law of nations. In laying down the rule, by which neutrals may expose themselves to the treatment of enemies, he also recommends certain modifications of the strict belligerent right, not as necessary limitations or exceptions to the right, and which a neutral is entitled to insist on; but as being merely recommended by a spirit of moderation and humanity, and which a belligerent may disregard according to his own discretion, or his estimate of necessity or prudence under existing circumstances, without incurring the odium of violating the established rules of civilized warfare; and it may be satisfactory to the court to see by how many degrees my operations at Foxardo fell short not only of what strict right authorized, but of what the most beneficial construction of the right would have recommended as within the bounds of moderation and humanity; it is also worthy of remark, that this author in the same passage here cited, illustrates belligerent as correlative to neutral rights by the known and conceded right to attack a ship manned by pirates, or a house occupied by robbers, although in that ship or in that house there may be many innocent persons whose lives are endangered by the attack.*

Such are the correlative rights and duties, as between belligerents and parties merely neutral. But their reciprocal rights and duties are infinitely extended when the parties assume the nearer and more intimate relation of allies embarked in a common cause.

An act perfectly lawful in a mere neutral, may be absolutely unlawful in an ally, and subject him to be treated as an enemy by the forces of the other ally. For instance, nothing is more lawful than for a neutral to trade with either or both of the belligerents; yet it is unlawful in the subjects or citizens of an ally, and exposes their ships and other property to seizure as prize, precisely as enemy property; and their persons to captivity and punishment.†

A nation is not bound to wait till the injury is actually felt, from the abuse of neutral or foreign territory; nor even till an enemy appears, who may take advantage of its means, and convert it to purposes of hostility; but in case of imminently approaching and foreseen peril, 'tis lawful it seems to take military occupation of such territory, in anticipation of the injuries that may accrue from expected and future hostility. This is strongly exemplified by the conduct of our government, and the principles on which it was publicly and officially justified in the occupation of Amelia Island and Galveston, the one in the undisputed possession of Spain, and within the uncontested and incontestible limits of her then province of East Florida; the other in the actual possession of Spain, and claimed as within the limits of her then province of West Florida, but within the contested limits of Louisiana. The military establishments at these places, in the hands of certain adventurers, acting under the authority, real or assumed, of some of the revolutionized provinces of South America, were suppressed by military force, and the places held by military occupation, till Amelia Island was restored by an arrangement with the Spanish government.

Among the reasons for this strong measure, given by the President of the United States, in his justificatory expositions of its policy and necessity, one is, that an extensive system of buccaneering throughout the Gulf of Mexico was about to be organized at those establishments, menacing the United States and the whole commercial world with all the horrors of piracy.‡ Then the apprehension of piracy, as the possible and imminent consequence of these obnoxious establishments, justified far stronger measures, and more decided acts of hostility upon Spanish territory than any committed by me in the course of flagrant war against actual pirates, who had established themselves in another part of Spanish territory, where the sovereign authority of Spain was equally relaxed; where these pirates, with whom I was engaged in active hostilities, found shelter and associates with persons under the nominal allegiance to Spain, but who neither felt nor acknowledged her authority for any purpose but as a cloak to their villanies. The documents on this transaction of our government, furnish strong illustrations of the extent to which the great and sound principles of self-defence authorize either corrective or preventive measures operating upon neutral territory.

I now come to such of our public transactions, and the documents that illustrate their history, and the principles on which they proceed, as bear the nearest affinity and the strongest analogy both in principle and in circumstance, to the conjuncture in which I was called to exercise a sound discretion in the practical application of these principles, to the actual state and condition of existing circumstances; when, as a naval commander, I was delegated to display the flag, and carry the arms of my country to remote regions; and there upon my sole responsibility, without other counsel than my devotion to her glory and prosperity, to fulfill the imperious duties of this high and most delicate of trusts, by upholding the just power, and vindicating the sovereign rights appertaining to her belligerent character, according to the laws and customs of war, and the dictates of military prudence; rights which I could neither abandon, relax, nor compromise, without diminution of her glory, and derogation from her dignity, nor without bringing contumely on her flag, and overwhelming myself with disgrace.

The principles established by the documents now adverted to regard Spain in her simple character of strict neutrality, without reference to her higher and more sacred obligations, or the corresponding claims upon her as an ally.

In the late war with Great Britain, in which the Indians of Florida took part against us, General Jackson was expressly authorized by President Madison to take Pensacola, if it were found to have fostered Indian hostilities by ministering to their wants, and affording them the means of annoyance. "If," proceeds the order, as indited by Secretary Armstrong, "the Spaniards admit into their towns, feed, arm, and co-operate with the hostile Indians, you must strike upon the broad principle of self preservation."

The principle thus concisely and forcibly enunciated, was developed and followed out to all its consequences and analogies, in the campaign of 1818, against certain Indian tribes of Florida, called Seminoles and Redsticks, who had commenced hostilities, and carried on the most savage warfare against our southern frontier. Spain being then just as much at peace, and in as positive a state of amity with us, as at any time since. She held the undisputed sovereignty of both the Floridas, where she maintained civil and military governors, numerous garrisons, and fortified places. But the extent of country over which she exercised any practical sway, was very inconsiderable, in proportion to the extensive regions occupied by numerous tribes of savages and outlaws, who nevertheless inhabited a country under her nominal sovereignty; and the physical power of each was in the same proportion.

When General Jackson, in the winter of 1818, took command of the army assembled to repel the incursions of the Indians, he found his predecessor, the second in command, General Gaines, in possession of certain limited and defined instructions for entering Florida in pursuit of the hostile Indians, if it should be found necessary to repress their inroads. The savage foe was soon driven to his fastnesses within the Spanish territory and jurisdiction, and pushed by his victorious pursuers to the vicinity of St. Marks, a fortress regularly garrisoned by Spanish troops, and being well ascertained by the general to have been a place of resort for the savages, where they obtained aid and comfort, and were abetted in their hostilities against our frontier, it was entered by our troops with violence, and held during the residue of the campaign. A British subject, domiciled there, under the protection of Spanish laws, was executed as a spy and incendiary, who had instigated the savages to hostility.*

The general then carried his victorious arms to Pensacola, the capital of the province, which was entered by our troops without opposition, the Spanish garrison having retreated to the neighboring fort of Barancas. This last was instantly invested, and, after a severe cannonade, was on the point of being stormed, when the Spanish governor and his garrison entered into a regular capitulation, surrendered the fort, and were transported to Cuba. Thus, in possession of the capital, and of all the strong places of the province, it was treated as a conquered country. Civil and military departments were organized, the laws of Spain continued in force, the preservation of the archives provided for, accompanied by all the minute arrangements usual after conquest. The stated provocation to these acts of hostility, are the inadequacy of the power of Spain to resist the encroachments of the savages; the provision and ammunition with which these last had been supplied, either extorted from the weakness or granted from the bad faith of the Spanish authorities: and lastly, the interruption by the Spanish governor to the passage of supplies from New Orleans for our troops up the river Escambia. The Spanish governor hearing of General Jackson's approach, had issued a proclamation forbidding it in the most indignant terms, and threatening to employ force if he did not immediately evacuate the country. This new and unexpected enemy, says the general, was made to feel the impotence of his threats. In the general orders and proclamation, setting forth these and other reasons for the measure, it is justified by the sacred and immutable laws of self-defence, as Spanish authority could not be maintained in Pensacola.† Having thus overrun one Spanish province, expelled its garrisons, and taken all its strong places, and thinking, with good reason, that Indian hostilities had been effectually checked, the general retired from the field. But hearing, in the course of the summer, fresh accounts of renewed or threatened hostilities, and of continued abuses of Spanish territory and means to our prejudice, he dispatched an order to General Gaines, directing him, if he should be satisfied of the fact of the Indians having been excited to hostility by Spanish agents and officers about St. Augustine, and fed and furnished from that place, immediately to occupy it, and the garrison as prisoners. This order was countermanded by the Secretary of War, not from any disapprobation of what had been done, or was about to be done, but because an amicable arrangement had in the meantime, and unknown to General Jackson, been made between the two governments for the restoration, upon certain conditions, of the Spanish posts already taken; with which arrangement it would have been altogether inconsistent to have proceeded with the capture of St. Augustine. All this was fully and satisfactorily explained to General Jackson.‡

These proceedings became the subject of the most animated and spirited controversy between the two governments. It was also doubted by many and respectable citizens, both in public and in private life, whether the general had not transcended his authority, and exercised the power of war and peace beyond all constitutional limits; and it became the subject of long and serious debates in Congress. But his conduct, in all its extent, was elaborately and victoriously justified by our government, in all its relations and departments, foreign and domestic. The complaints of Spanish ministers were triumphantly answered, and finally silenced, by the official replies of the Secretary of State. The messages of the President to both houses of Congress explained and justified the grounds of the general's procedure, and the vote of the House of Representatives adopted and confirmed the justification offered by the Executive.§ Against all which, there remained nothing to be set off but an adverse report of a committee of the Senate, which has been suffered ever since to repose in utter neglect, notwithstanding the general at the next session presented a memorial to the Senate, remonstrating in free and decided terms against the course of investigation pursued by the committee, as unfair, and against their conclusions as unsound in doctrine, and as resulting from partial and uncandid views of the subject.

Now let the principles so clearly deduced from these most authoritative precedents, be applied to my situation and conduct, as commander of the squadron in the West Indies, engaged in actual war against the pirates.

From a variety of causes, too obvious to be mentioned, the Spanish islands in the West Indies were, for the most part, more destitute of any practical, steady, and efficient government and police than the inhabited parts of the Floridas. The pirates who sought shelter there were not, like the miserable savages of Florida, insulated and cut off from access to other quarters for relief, so as to be dependent on Spanish towns and garrisons for occasional supplies of provisions, arms, and ammunition. On the contrary, their enterprising and successful piracies, and the accumulated plunder of land and sea, gave them influence and favor in the more barren and thinly inhabited districts, and in some of the more considerable towns and settlements; while their numbers, their resources, and their ferocity, overawed and intimidated those who were not seduced by participation in the spoils of piratical enterprise. When the hot pursuit of our cruisers had driven them from the sea, and destroyed all their vessels capable of keeping the sea, they retreated into various parts of Cuba and Porto Rico; in some places banded themselves against the local authorities, and effectually defied every effort to reduce them. In other places they assumed various disguises, as fishermen, drougers, pedlers, &c., &c. As fishermen, they built huts and villages upon the coasts of these two islands, and kept up a constant intercourse with the inhabitants, from whom it was extremely difficult to distinguish them. The innumerable bays, inlets, shoals, and harbors about these islands enabled them to conceal the boats in which they nightly sallied forth from their holds, and committed innumerable piracies, as well upon the high seas as in the towns and settlements on the neighboring coasts. They then retreated with their plunder to their secret haunts, reässumed their disguises, and eluded detection and pursuit. They were occasionally, however, detected—their huts and villages, with all their boats, fishing tackle, &c., burnt and destroyed. Several instances of these descents upon the coasts of Cuba and Porto Rico, by the officers of my squadron, are found in the official correspondence and reports, now before the court, especially in my report to the Secretary of the Navy, and in the report of Captain Cassin, and Lieutenant Commandant Kearney to me, in the spring and summer of 1823.* This state and condition of the Spanish islands was not only perfectly notorious, but has been officially ascertained and promulgated, and is now matter of authentic history; for in the President's messages to Congress, on the 2d December, 1823 and 1824, and the reports of the Secretary of the Navy on the 1st December in the same years, accompanying those messages, all these facts are fully detailed; the good dispositions of the colonial government, at least of the Governor of Cuba, are acknowledged; and the toleration of the piratical establishments within their jurisdictions explained by the weakness of their means, and the relaxed state of their authority. So strong were these representations that, at the last session, a bill was introduced and seriously debated, authorizing a blockade of the Spanish ports in Cuba and Porto Rico—the latter having been designated in the official communications from the President as affording the most numerous haunts for pirates.

As to Foxardo, you have it clearly proved how notorious were that town and district, and an extensive tract of country around, as the most pernicious haunts for pirates, including two other noted places on the same coast, called Naguaba and Bocca del Inferno, from twenty to twenty-five miles from Foxardo, and equally notorious for the resort of pirates, and as receptacles for their plunder. It was to the latter of these places, known by so characteristic an appellation, that the crew of the piratical vessel driven on shore by Lieutenant Sloat attempted to retreat, as reported in his letter to the Secretary of the Navy on the 19th March last. I did not, however, act upon the sole authority of report and notoriety, more than sufficient as they are when sufficiently credible to justify military movements. It was not till an American merchant, resident at St. Thomas, had been robbed of property to a considerable amount, in one of these marauding expeditions, traced upon credible information to Foxardo, nor until after an officer of my squadron, who had landed in the most peaceable and inoffensive manner to inquire after the pirates and the plunder, had been treacherously seized and disgracefully treated at Foxardo that I determined to land and make an impression upon that place. I presume no military or naval officer is to be blamed for acting upon credible and circumstantial information; he is not to be expected to wait for either legal or moral certainty of proof. The necessity and propriety of the measure, and the correctness of the information upon which I proceeded, are amply confirmed, 'Tis in proof that the spontaneous opinion of the merchants of St. Thomas and of the whole squadron, without any particular communication from me, was clear and decided, not only for the necessity and propriety of the measure, but that it must and would be executed. My intentions were as clearly inferred, from what circumstances decided that they ought to be, as if I had fully declared them. The whole course and event of the action entirely confirmed every anticipation. I no sooner approached the harbor under the most unequivocal demonstrations of the real character of my squadron than I found a party no wise distinguishable in arms, equipments, or appearance from the pirates usually found on shore, and who, in the instances before mentioned, had attacked Captain Cassin and Lieutenants Kearney and Newton, by whom their villages and huts had been burnt and destroyed.

This party stood ready, with two guns, on a point of rock, and the instant I had anchored, without one act of hostility or menace on my part, and without any previous parley on theirs, commenced hostilities by training the guns on my nearest vessel, and then on the boat which was approaching the shore; and nothing, I presume, but the perplexity in which they were kept between the two objects, prevented them from firing on us; they dispersed before our party reached their battery, the guns of which we spiked. We found the village entirely deserted—no human being to be found with whom we could hold parley. When it is recollected that I had established a good understanding with the Governors of Cuba and Porto Rico; was acting in concert with them, had remitted to their jurisdiction pirates whom we had taken, and who had been punished by the local governments; when all this was known and notorious, how could I, in reason, account for these demonstrations of hostility, immediately on my approach to the harbor of Foxardo, and for the flight of the party, and the desertion of the village? Was I not authorized, nay bound, to conclude from the circumstances, taken in connection with the infamous character of the place, that it was a piratical establishment? Did it not require, at any rate, further investigation, and that I should proceed to examine into the state of things at the small town of Foxardo, only a mile or two from the harbor? Nothing, I think, can exceed the caution and moderation with which I proceeded. A flag was sent in advance with a letter, addressed to a sort of inferior magistrate called an alcalde, the only officer, except a very low and disreputable person called the captain of the port, who was to be found there. As we followed the flag into the interior, the most perfect order prevailed among our troops; and no whisper of complaint has been heard of the slightest injury to the persons or property of the inhabitants. The further we advanced, new circumstances of suspicion to confirm all we had heard, and all we had inferred from what happened at our first landing arose. There was the same irregular assemblage of armed men; equally equivocal in character and appearance, as those who had been dispersed at the battery, without any of the ordinary badges to distinguish them as belonging to the government of the country; and, by their causeless hostility, justifying the worst suspicions of their character and intentions. When I met the alcalde, accompanied by some of the better sort from the town, he excused himself, for his conduct to Lieuts. Platt and Ritchie, as under compulsion from others: and this was repeated to Lieut. Platt, by the interpreter and another person in the alcalde's train. The nature of the person and the persons from whom it proceeded were not explained; and as Lieut. Platt declares, there appeared some strange mystery about the transaction. The mystery may, perhaps, be very satisfactorily cleared up; when it is recollected Lieuts. Platt and Ritchie, at their former visit, had at first been received by the alcalde with civility; but that the rabble were extremely exasperated against them. From all which, connected with the infamy of the place, and the very suspicious conduct and appearance of the people whom we encountered, it might reasonably enough be concluded, that the pirates were strong both in numbers and influence, and had overawed and held in subjection the miserable functionary, who bore the badge without the substance of a regularly constituted authority: which it would have been absurd, and derogatory to any government to have treated as qualified to challenge the respect due to a sovereign in the person of his representative.

Then, was not here presented a clear case of "the jurisdiction of Spain ceasing at the point where her weakness failed to maintain her authority?"

What possible distinction between the hostile appropriation of Spanish territory and Spanish means, to our injury, by the pirates in this instance, and by the Seminoles and other savages in Florida? In truth, every circumstance and every reason that were admitted as the most triumphant justification of the course pursued in the campaign in Florida, are here more clear and pronounced; and yet because I merely displayed my force on Spanish territory, by way of intimidation; exacted an apology for the past, and promise of amendment for the future; and spike two guns from which, on leaving the harbor, I should have been in imminent danger of a raking fire, from a lawless banditti, who might have secreted themselves from pursuit and punishment: for this have I been recalled in displeasure, and subjected to a rigorous and penal prosecution: notwithstanding the clear proof, now manifest to the court, that the most beneficial consequences had resulted from this operation: that instead of producing any impediment to the service, from the ill-will either of the authorities or inhabitants of the island, it served to awe the disaffected, and inspire universal respect for our arms and character. From the subsequent correspondence of Lieut. Sloat, it appears that Governor Torre had been reported to have dropped some hasty expressions of anger; but if he really uttered such, it was a momentary ebullition; for his letter to Lieut. Sloat, of the 17th March last, sufficiently demonstrates his good-will; and, indeed, contains warmer expressions of thanks for our exertions, than are to be found in any of his preceding communications. The effect upon the public in general was decided and instantaneous; indeed the increased respect and confidence in the vigor, determination, and efficiency of our measures; and the consequent facilities likely to be obtained, in the pursuit of our object, exceeded all expectation. The public honors bestowed on Lieut. Platt, at Ponce, only forty miles from Foxardo, and expressly on account of the share he had borne in the affair of Foxardo, may give some idea of the prevailing sentiment.

As I have said, nothing could exceed the astonishment with which I received an intimation of the displeasure of my own government. The only apprehension I entertained, and the only circumstance having the remotest tendency to self-reproach in the whole affair, were, that I had fallen too far short of the point to which my authority would have reached, and to which my duty under existing circumstances should have pushed it: and, at this day, if I were under trial for not having seized and garrisoned or destroyed the village at the harbor, and even the town of Foxardo, as pernicious pirate nests; for not having arrested and made prisoners the people; or those at any rate who had made any demonstrations of hostility; I should have conceived myself in far more danger of censure, for having left undone those things which I ought to have done, than now, for doing those things which I ought not to have done.

My best, if not my only defence, in such case would have been, the want of the force and the means necessary to give complete effect to the operation; and the eventual benefits resulting from the actual and more moderate operation.

It may possibly be doubted whether the pursuit and arrest of pirates on the high seas under a regular commission from a sovereign power, and with the public armed force of the country, be a war or a mere exertion of the power of internal police for the arrest and judicial punishment of criminals. In short the want of a regular declaration of war may be insisted on.

It is a remarkable fact, that what with the continually recurring wars with the Indian tribes, the Barbary States, and more recently with England, not omitting what has been called the quasi war with France, in 1798, this country has enjoyed but very short intervals of peace since the formation of the government; and yet, there stands upon record but the single instance of a declaration of war, in that against England, on the 18th June, 1812. The Constitution has vested in Congress, the exclusive power of declaring war; but they may also provide for the calling out of the necessary force to suppress insurrections and repel invasion: and they have executed this last power by a special act of Congress empowering the President to call out the proper force on such occasions. All our Indian wars, with every characteristic and concomitant of the most regular war, have resulted from the mere act of having placed at the disposal of the President a military force, for the protection of the frontier, and to repel the hostile incursions of the Indians. The war commencing in this merely defensive operation, has resulted in all the incidental consequences, which we have seen exemplified in General Jackson's campaign in Florida, and in all the preceding Indian wars; for none of them were commenced under any more formal declaration, or with any more solemn preliminaries, than that of a hostile invasion repelled by force; and of a defensive war pushed, in its consequences, to offensive operations in order to make the defence effectual and complete. So the wars with the Barbary States were commenced in the same way: a naval force is placed at the disposal of the President, for the protection of our commerce, against the Barbary cruisers, and the history of our naval operations is too well known to this court to justify me in taking up their time, by recounting the captures by sea, the blockades, the menaced bombardments, the intercepting of enemy property in neutral bottoms, and all the other concomitants and incidents of the most regular of maratime wars which have resulted from this simple measure of defence. So the modified hostilities with France, limited, as they were supposed to be, by the terms of the law that authorized them, to a mere resistance of the abused right of search, and to the capture of such of their public or private armed ships as should be found committing aggressions upon our commerce, immediately blazed out in all the ardor of a maritime war, unlimited in its spirit and extent but by the scarcity of objects, in the condition of the French marine, upon which the valor and enterprise of our navy could be displayed. We did not wait till a French frigate or armed cruiser could be met flagrant with aggression, but in what place, condition or circumstances soever met, she was instantly attacked, taken, and held as lawful prize of war.

This war against the pirates in the West Indies, was just as formally declared as any of our preceding wars by land or sea, except the late war with England, and carried with it all the concomitants and incidents of a public war; without regard to the form of the preliminaries, or the circumstances of its commencement. The machine once put in motion, was impelled by its own inherent energies, without the help of proclamations or other paper muniments.

A naval force was placed by a law of Congress at the disposal of the President, to be employed in the most effectual way according to the best of his judgment, and under suitable instructions to the commanders, in repelling the aggressions and depredations of the pirates.* Under the authority of this act, and the instructions of the President, the war against the pirates was commenced and carried on. That it was a regular war against public enemies, and entitled not only to equal but to greater respect from other nations, than ordinary wars, is clearly established by reason and authority. Pirates are not the enemies of one nation only, but of the whole human race, and all civilized nations are, or ought to be in league against them; there can, in the nature of things, be no neutrals in such a war. As I have before remarked, the rights of war in general, seem to have been derived for the most part from the analogies of war against pirates. We find that the President, in his message to Congress, explaining and justifying the conduct of General Jackson, towards the Spanish authorities in Florida, enumerates their encouragement of buccaneering, as one of the enormities which has forfeited their neutral character; and General Jackson himself, in his official correspondence, justifying the apparent severity of his proceeeings against persons claiming Spanish protection, can find no more emphatic reprobation of their character, as placing them and their abettors out of the pale of the law of nations, and justifying every extremity against both, than to denominate them land pirates. Grotius, as I have remarked, infers belligerent rights, in regard to third parties, not being enemies, from the analogous right to destroy pirates, though to the danger and probable damage of innocent persons.

If the question rested on general reason and authority, it would seem to be settled. But I have a stronger and more practical warrant, in the very instructions which I am charged with having violated: a document that loses none of the authority due to its official character, from having been signed, and probably indited by a gentleman whose talents and learning have illustrated a high judicial station in New York, before he was called to the administration of the Navy Department; and are now added to the splendid assemblage of the same qualities, on the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States. These instructions lay down the doctrine, and apply it to the actual case, in terms that leave not the shadow of a doubt, as to the relations in which I was to hold myself, as well towards the pirates as the Spanish authorities and people.

"You will announce (says my letter of instructions) your arrival and object to the authorities, civil and military, of the Island of Cuba, and endeavor to obtain, as far as shall be practicable, their co-operation, or at least their favorable and friendly support, giving them the most unequivocal assurance that your sole object is the destruction of pirates.

"The system of piracy which has grown up in the West Indies, has obviously arisen from the war between Spain and the new governments, her late provinces in this hemisphere, and from the limited force in the islands and their sparse population, many portions of each being entirely uninhabited and desolate, to which the active authority of the government does not extend. It is understood that establishments have been made by parties of these banditti in those uninhabited parts, to which they carry their plunder, and retreat in time of danger. It cannot be presumed that the government of any island will afford any protection or countenance to such robbers. It may, on the contrary, confidently be believed that all governments, and particularly those most exposed, will afford all means in their power for their suppression. Pirates are considered, by the laws of nations, the enemies of the human race. It is the duty of all nations to put them down; and none who respect their own character or interest will refuse to do it, much less afford them an asylum and protection. The nation that makes the greatest exertions to suppress such banditti, has the greatest merit. In making such exertions it has a right to the aid of every other power to the extent of its means, and to the enjoyment, under its sanction, of all its rights in the pursuit of the object. In the case of belligerents, where the army of one party enters the territory of a neutral power, the army of the other has a right to follow it there.

"In the case of pirates, the right of the armed force of one power to follow them into the territory of another, is more complete. In regard to pirates there is no neutral party; they being the enemies of the human race all nations are parties against them, and may be considered as allies."

I lost no time in establishing an understanding with the Governors of Porto Rico and Cuba, as recommended by these instructions; and, as fully appears from the documents accompanying the President's message to Congress, December 2, 1823, before referred to. From these it has been seen that both the governors recognized, without hesitation, the meritorious character of the war; pledged themselves for every aid and co-operation in their power; that, in various instances, they did co-operate, and actually received prisoners taken by our squadron, both at sea and on land, and had them executed. Thus, the presumption upon which my instructions proceeded, that the local governments of these islands were to be considered and treated as allies, in a regular war, was confirmed and consolidated into a solemn compact, followed by all the practical and open evidences of alliance and common cause.

I conceive it to have been clearly made out that, in the simple character of neutrals, the conduct of the people of Foxardo would have justified stronger measures than any adopted by me towards them; but, as the subjects of an ally embarked in a common cause, they were out of the pale of protection from their own state; they were identified with the enemy of their own state, and the worst species of enemy—pirates.

They were themselves either actually or constructively pirates; and, in attacking and subduing them (if I had gone that length) I should have attacked and subdued the enemies of the very state whose territory and sovereignty I am charged with having violated.

The only question, then, that remains, is, whether it were a violation of my instructions to have awed these people into some regard for their own duties towards both the allies, and some greater respect to the allied arms, by a display of military power—pushed no further than to produce the moral effect of operating on their fears, by a demonstration of what we could and would do if they persisted in their iniquities. The question, then, may be reduced to this: whether a set of instructions that passed through the hands of so eminent a lawyer and judge as Secretary Thompson, and had received the sanction of his name, had been so improvidently phrased as to forbid me from doing the very thing I was sent to do, namely, from protecting the commerce and the citizens of the United States from piracy, when it should so happen that the perpetrators, or, what is the same thing, the abettors, associates and accessories of the perpetrators, and so identified in appearance and circumstance with them as rendered it impracticable to make any specific distinction between principal and accessory, appeared, in the persons who had added to the crime of piracy that of flying in the face of the authority of that government under which they pretended to live: an absurdity upon the face of the proposition, and, therefore, impossible to be inferred from any sensible and well advised instructions.

Still, it may be more satisfactory to enter into some analysis of that document, in order to see if its terms give any color to so strange an imputation on its consistency.

Let it be remembered that the question is not whether my instructions, in terms, import an authority to do the act, but whether they prohibit it. It has already been shown, from reason, authority and precedent, that, in proceeding upon the principle of self-defence, to attack or repel the enemy by the same means that he uses for our annoyance, no act of hostility is supposed to be committed against the neutral or allied sovereign when his territory or his subjects are involved in the consequences of belligerent operations.

That it was not to attack or to punish Spain, but simply to repel the attack of the enemy through her instrumentality, and with her means, was the principle assumed throughout the whole of General Jackson's justification. To have made war upon Spain, for any cause; either for her violation of treaties, or for her breach of neutrality, could have been justified in no other way, but by the express authority of Congress, who have the exclusive jurisdiction of peace and war, and are the exclusive judges when and for what provocations war shall be declared. It is for them, and them alone, to decide whether national insults or injuries shall be resented or waived. The utmost extent of the President's power, is to call out the force of the nation to repel invasions; in the exercise of which power, it is true, almost all our belligerent operations, since the existence of the government, have been carried on. All these operations, then, upon Spanish territory and subjects, by way of self-defence against our enemy, result from the incidental rights of actual war, as fully vested in every naval or military commander, to whose hands the arms of the republic are committed, as in the President himself. The only difference is, that the President, in his quality of commander-in-chief, may restrain or modify, at pleasure, the practical exercise of the right, by them in command under him; but, in the absence of such restraining order, these high belligerent rights exist, in their full force, in the person of the officer in the immediate command, whatever be his rank. Upon that principle was the capture of the Spanish towns and posts in Florida, explained and justified. The American note, before cited, expressly states, that General Jackson had no order, from his government, to take them; but that he decided, from his own discretion, upon the measure; "of the necessity for which he had the most effectual means of forming a judgment; and the vindication of which is written in every page of the law of nations, as well as in the first law of nature—self-defence."

Then my justification requires no order or instruc ion commanding or authorizing, while it is indispensable, to the crimination of my conduct, that some order should be shown forbidding me to exercise the otherwise clear right to adopt the highly expedient, necessary, and, in all its public results, most fortunate measure, now in question. The incidental power, to its fullest extent, was inherent to my command; unless that command had been stripped of it, by a positive order. This brings us directly to the question, whether my instructions, of the 1st February, 1823, do, in terms, forbid me to exercise this power. I maintain, not only that there is the absence of any such prohibition, express or implied, but that the course of conduct which I pursued, is enjoined by my instructions; and if I had neglected that injunction, I should at once have basely betrayed the high and sovereign rights of war; with which the glory and safety of the nation are so essentially connected; and have violated the letter and spirit of my instructions, by a course of conduct directly opposite to that, now imputed to me, as a disobedience of orders.

I shall proceed to lay down a few simple rules of interpretation, by which the sense, in which I clearly understood and acted, upon my instructions, may be demonstrated, as their true import and meaning.

1. The reason or final cause, the main end to be accomplished, deserves the first consideration. Then, I was appointed to the command of the squadron, for the purpose of "repressing piracy, and affording effectual protection to the citizens and commerce of the United States." I am told that it is "my duty to protect our commerce against all unlawful interruptions, and to guard the rights both of persons and property of the citizens of the United States wherever it shall become necessary." Such is the final cause, or end of the armament. It was upon this principle, mainly, that General Jackson rested the justification of his procedure in Florida, when he appealed to his instructions, from the War Department, in which he was informed that the "honor and interest of the United States, required a speedy and successful termination of the war:" and, he argues, that he pursued the only means by which he could have effectuated that intent; and that the intent, both general and particular, expressed in the order, justified the means: those means being, in themselves, entirely conformable to the established laws and usages of war.*

The means, by which I was to have accomplished the object of my command, were left to my discretion, under the guidance of some general rules. The limitations of my authority from which anything like a prohibition may be inferred, are expressed in two clauses. I am, in the first place, told that "where a government exists and is felt, you will, in all instances, respect the local authorities; and only act in aid of, and co-operation with them:" and again, "in no case are you to pursue and apprehend any one, after having been forbidden to do so, by competent authority of the local governments." Now the the term "government," or "local government," certainly means the supreme power of the country; and, in reference to the Spanish islands, means the several provincial governments there established, called local, in contradistinction to the government of the mother country, which is supreme over all. It cannot be pretended, that the term comprehends the inferior magistrates of obscure towns and villages. Then this government must not only exist, but must be felt: and felt to what purpose, and to what extent? Surely, to no less than to maintain, practically and efficiently, its sovereign and active authority, in the country; to the purpose and to the extent of holding it inviolate, from the inroads of the common enemy. In a preceding part of the instructions, places to which the "active authority of the government does not extend," are spoken of: nor can it be less than the active authority of the government, in any case, that I was bound to respect. I am told, repeatedly, in my instructions, that I am to presume that the Spanish authorities and people will make common cause with me, and cordially co-operate with me: I am told so in the very clause which requires me to respect the local governments: and strange, indeed, if I had been required to respect them on any other terms. I was acting, not only upon this presumption, but upon the faith of direct and positive assurances from these very local governments, that they would so co-operate; confirmed by unequivocal acts of co-operation. When I came to discover, upon these islands, extensive settlements of pirates, in the various disguises of fishermen, &c.; when I found considerable districts, in the possession, or under the controlling influence, of pirates; would it have comported with due respect to the local governments, to have presumed that such infamous abuses were by their authority; and that, by attacking the pirates, I should be invading the rights and dignity of the governments? Are these pirates to be viewed, in such circumstances, as "Spanish authorities, or people," in the sense of my instructions?

If such were the presumptions upon which we were to act, we committed innumerable transgressions, in the instances of the several piratical establishments broken up and destroyed, without complaint, on the coast of Cuba, as before mentioned.

But the meaning of this injunction, to respect the local authorities, where a government exists and is felt, is decided by its immediate context; for it goes on to direct that I shall only act in aid of, and co-operation with, them. Now the one of these injunctions, is just as obligatory as the other: those whom I am to respect, I must co-operate with and aid: they must be in a condition to challenge the observance of both, or of neither. Then, if I am to respect the people and authorities of the islands, who are identified in character and conduct, with the pirates, I must also act in aid of and co-operation with them; and how consistent this may be, the main end and aim of repressing piracy, and affording effectual protection to the commerce and citizens of the United States, needs no remark to illustrate. When I am told that I must not continue the pursuit of pirates on shore, "after having been forbidden to do so by competent authority of the local government," should I have been justified in accepting the prohibition of the pirates themselves; or of their known, or strongly suspected associates and accessories, as from such competent authority? The only prohibition ever received by me, was in the form of open hostility and resistance, no otherwise to be accounted for, than as an attack upon the suppressors, and a defence of the professors of piracy. Lieut. Platt was not forbidden the pursuit and inquiry which occasioned his first visit to Foxardo: but he was at first received with insidious civility, and a professed respect to his official character, and in that guise conducted to the town, where the treatment he afterwards received was equally unaccountable, upon any other ground than that of the people, or a majority of them, making common cause, or being identified with the pirates. I am further directed, if the crews of any vessels, which I have either seen engaged in acts of piracy, or have just cause to suspect, as being of that character, retreat into the ports, harbors, or settled parts of the islands, I may enter in pursuit of them, for the purpose of aiding the local authorities, or people, as the case may be, to seize and bring the offender to justice; previously giving notice, that it is my sole object. Then here is an affirmative direction, (not necessary to communicate the authority, but only declaratory of an authority already inherent to my command,) to pursue the enemy into the ports, harbors, and settled parts of the island, but qualified by a limitation, which necessarily supposes that there are authorities or people present, who have the will, and, with my aid, the power to seize the offenders, and bring them to justice. But suppose no authorities or people of that description are to be found; and though the country be ever so thickly settled, it is occupied and held by pirates and their accessories, who exert a controlling influence and effective power over the district, and hold what people and authorities there may be, in check, or in close alliance: is not the hypothesis, upon which the limitation of my otherwise absolute authority is expressly founded, done away, and is not that authority consequently left in its pristine force? Is there any possible construction of the document that could require of me to aid and assist people to seize and bring themselves to justice? The very case put by my instructions, as requiring the pursuit of the piratical crew, was presented. I had just cause more than to suspect that such a crew, which had robbed an "American citizen" at St. Thomas, had retreated with their plunder to Foxardo; and, in the pursuit of them, I am encountered at the threshold by men of the most equivocal appearance, who stand forward to resist the pursuers and defend the pursued without parley or warning of any kind. Then, was I not bound to conclude, that these men knew what they were about, and that the defenders and the persons pursued were the same? I knew to a certainty that they were not, and, in the nature of things, could not be, acting under the authority of the local government; but I had the strongest grounds to presume that they were acting against it. What reason had I to presume that they had any better authority than the pirates who fired upon Captain Cassin, near Cayo Blanco, and upon Lieutenants Kearney and Newton at Cape Cruz; and who, on other occasions, and at other places, committed the like violence, and, upon being pursued to the interior, were found to be settled in fishing villages, defended by cannon advantageously posted on the rocks?

It seems to me plainly impossible to construe my instructions as a prohibition of the operation upon Foxardo, consistently either with their context, or with the prominent and declared reason, or final cause of the course of service which they prescribed. A learned and judicious author has said, that "the nature of every law must be judged of by the end for which it was made, and by the aptness of things therein prescribed, unto the same end;" a rule which absolutely concludes the present question.

2. The rule, which requires an expression to be interpreted from its relation to what goes before, and what follows the place where it stands, "has been embraced under the head of rational interpretation already considered." But another rule, entering largely into every question of interpretation, is derived from "the circumstance of the same, or equivalent expressions being used by the same person, to express the same intentions, on other similar occasions."*

Upon this point, it becomes material to examine the orders or instructions under which General Jackson acted, in the campaign before mentioned. The restrictive clauses of these orders, being more directly to the point, shall be more particularly noticed: they are explained by two documents: 1st—The President's message to Congress, March 25, 1818, declares that "to the high obligations and privileges of the great and sacred right of self-defence, will the movement of our troops be confined; orders are accordingly given to the general, not to enter Florida, but in pursuit of the enemy; and in that case to respect the Spanish authority wherever it is maintained."† 2dly—in Mr. Adams' letter to our minister at Madrid, the order is laid down in nearly the same terms.‡ The only difference between the terms of the restriction upon him, and upon me, is that in my case, the government must be felt; in his, its authority maintained—and what difference there may be between these terms may be explained, (if indeed explanation can be necessary,) by a reference to the President's subsequent message, of November 17th, 1818, where this very expression of a government being felt is used;* and though there was a regularly organized colonial government, in possession of towns and fortified places, with well appointed garrisons, within the precincts of which Spanish authority was paramount and undisputed; yet, because their authority was confined almost exclusively to the walls of St. Augustine, Pensacola, &c., because they could not exercise an efficient and active authority over those without the walls; and because all these strongholds were made subservient to the purposes of Indian hostility, the authority of the government was held not to have been "maintained," not to have been "felt," even within the walls of places garrisoned by their troops; not even in the capitals of their provinces, where the government actually resided. These very places were taken, because the authority of the government was not maintained or felt, to the extent required by her neutral duties, and necessary to give effect to our lawful means of repressing Indian hostilities. When the general found that the government was not sufficiently maintained or felt, to fulfill the final cause or end of his military operations, but tended to defeat it, he was justified in concluding that it was not maintained or felt to the degree supposed by the limitation in his instructions, and of course that the limitation fell with the hypothesis upon which it was founded.

Lest it be surmised that the government was secretly actuated by any policy to attack and undermine Spanish power in the Floridas, not applicable to the state of things in the West Indies, (if it be necessary to vindicate the government against any sort of double dealing.) I may refer to the successive orders from the War Department to Generals Gaines and Jackson, from the 2d December, 1817, to the 6th February, 1818.† By these it appears, that it was contrary to the policy and inclination of the United States, to be embroiled with Spain at that time. The state of the pending negotiation is referred to as rendering it impolitic to provoke her; and General Gaines is instructed, that, if the Indians, when pursued into Florida, shelter themselves under a Spanish fort, he is to stop, and give notice to the government.

A practical construction is given to my orders, by the toleration of all the previous descents upon Cuba and Porto Rico, followed by the destruction of settlements, having all the appearance of innocent fishing villages, where were assembled men, women, and children, of all ages; and which were, nevertheless, found to belong to pirates, in disguise.‡

But, suppose I have failed to establish the construction of my orders, as understood by myself, and now explained; does it follow that I am guilty of any disobedience of orders, under the naval articles of war? The negative may be clearly maintained, on two grounds.

1. The articles of war look only to orders given by a superior officer in immediate command; not to general instructions from the government; the observance of which, it is supposed, the government has, in its own hands, the means of enforcing.

2. The instructions are discretionary; and no officer can be charged with the breach of a discretionary order, unless he willfully and corruptly misconstrue and pervert them. For no mistake of judgment can be, in the nature of things, punishable. Here is the law of nations laid down to me in my instructions; to be applied in a great variety of supposed circumstances, to facts as they arise. A number of rules, defining the relative rights of the parties are prescribed, requiring the exercise of discreet judgment to expound them. I apprehend it to be impossible for any man to review the circumstances of this case, without admitting, whatever be his opinion of my judgment, or my reasoning, that I might not, in the honest exercise of my reason and judgment, have done the act with which I am charged.

To bring me within the scope of this most penal charge, it must appear, that I was either positively ordered to do something that I omitted, or positively forbidden to do something that I did; or that, under pretence of executing a discretionary authority, I corruptly or maliciously abused it.

Second charge and specification.

The second branch of the accusation has, from the first, occasioned me no little perplexity, which has, in no degree, been relieved by any elucidation in the course of the present trial. Whether any, and what sort of justification it made incumbent on me, was not so easy to determine, from any matter of crimination, either distinctly pronounced, or properly to be inferred from the context of the charge or the specifications.

The process neither of the evidence, nor of the argument, by which the gist of the prosecution, and the points on which it turned, should have been distinctly explained, or openly vindicated, has tended to possess me with any more clear or detailed information of the specific quality and degree of the offence with which I was to be charged, or of the penal consequences supposed to be attached to it, than might have been collected from the extremely vague and indefinite, if not unintelligible, terms of the charge and the specifications. Indeed, the impenetrable reserve, affecting mystery, if not studious of concealment, by which such dim and partial views of these points have been vouchsafed, would seem to indicate the darkest suspicions, and a necessity for a prosecution as unrelenting in its purpose, and as unscrupulous in its means, as could be, at all admissible in any judicial procedure, as if it were dealing with some wily and veteran offender, skilled and experienced in all the subtilties of evasion; and who was to be caught in his iniquities only by pouncing upon him unawares, and by concealing from him the quarter of attack, till the unseen blow, pushed home and felt in all its force, should have overwhelmed him with the shame of open detection, while unprovided with a subterfuge, and cut off from all retreat.

I was instructed by the clear and unhesitating advice of my counsel, confirmed by as clear an insight into the merits of the question as could be obtained by my own common sense, to conclude that this branch of the accusation purported to charge me with no offence of which this court had any judicial cognizance; and my own conscience, as far as it had been enlightened by any knowledge or conjecture of the transactions, so darkly alluded to, was equally void of any offence to which any degree of guilt, either legal or moral, could be imputed. Indeed it was clear enough, upon the face of the accusation itself, how sedulously the responsibility of having imputed anything immoral or dishonorable, had been guarded against; and, accordingly, that instead of a definite and precise charge, supported by specifications, in any proper and legitimate sense of the term, vague censures, clothed in loose generalities, and in the most ambiguous and perplexed phraseology, had been introduced, by a strange abuse of terms, under the name of a charge and specifications.

* Niles' Reg. vol 15, p. 213.
† Vide Niles' Reg., vol. 15, p. 303–5.
‡ Vide Lieut. Kearney's report, in Aug., 1823, among the documents with the President's message, of Dec., 1823, p. 174.

Perfectly consistent with the original frame of the accusation, has been the method in which it has been followed out, in the proof and in the argument.

Voluminous masses of documents, consisting of a miscellaneous correspondence, and a printed pamphlet, of more than one hundred pages, were produced in evidence, under the several specifications, and indiscriminately read, from beginning to end, without any specific designation or reference whatever to the passages or the circumstances wherein the offensive matter was supposed to consist, with the single exception of the alleged omissions, deficiencies and verbal inaccuracies, charged upon that part of my pamphlet, which purports to set out the proceedings of the court of inquiry; which were, indeed, vouchsafed after the trial had proceeded for more than a fortnight. Additional masses, little less voluminous, of documents and other collateral evidence, have been introduced, and, in like manner, read indiscriminately, from beginning to end, without the slightest intimation of the charge or the specification to which they were to be applied, far less of the bearing they were supposed to have on any point of the accusation, or of the purpose and object of their introduction. In two instances, witnesses have been introduced to authenticate numerous documents, without naming or describing them; and even without any enumeration or description of them being entered on the minutes, which record the evidence by which they are authenticated. Our request to have these documents openly exhibited and subjected to our inspection, or at any rate, to be furnished with a list and specific description of them, has been denied; and all that was vouchsafed to us, was an intimation that it would be time enough for us to see and inspect the documents when they came to be successively produced, as wanted from time to time, in the progress of the trial. In the meantime they have been kept under lock and key, wholly inaccessible to me; and, to this very day, I am ignorant how many, or what part, or indeed if any of these documents have since been found useful to subserve the ends of the prosecution, or have been actually used as evidence; though I presume, (but without any responsible assurance of the fact,) that some part of my official correspondence with the Navy Department, since read and attached to the record, entered into the composition of this strange paradox, of documents openly proved in a court of justice, and yet unknown either to the court, or to the party against whom they were produced. At a late stage of the trial, interrogatories are exhibited, for the examination of a witness upon deposition. Explanation is asked, and unhesitatingly denied: 1st, of the authority for taking a deposition, instead of confronting the witness with the accused, as indispensably required, (with a few stated exceptions, expressly provided for by statute,) in every criminal case, and above all, in every capital case; and this, not only in the absence of any direct authority to be found in the naval articles of war, or other law, but in the face of an article expressly requiring that the witnesses examined before a naval court-martial, shall be sworn by the president of the court. 2d, of the purpose for which this deposition was wanted, and of the point to which it was to be applied, in order that I might frame the cross-interrogatories, which I was called upon to furnish, with a discreet forecast of the operation and effect of the evidence upon my cause. The deposition, taken before a county justice of the peace, after having been held up, for some days, without any notice to me that it had been received, is at length produced, and read to the court, under the same silence and reserve as to the bearing or relevancy it might be supposed to have upon any matter put in issue by any of these charges and specifications—the want of relevancy and pertinency to any such matter, being apparent upon its face.

Whether, in all this, there was anything to be condemned as irregular, according to the established law and practice of courts-martial, this court has not been called on to decide; for I was wearied out, myself, and apprehensive of fatiguing the court, and exhausting its valuable time by raising my voice so frequently against the constantly occurring aberrations from the salutary forms of procedure usually observed in criminal prosecutions, and equally indispensable to the due administration of justice in a military, as in a civil court. I made this sacrifice of my right to complain and to remonstrate with no other hesitation but what arose from my reluctance to sanction a dangerous precedent; the pernicious consequences of which, to the principles of military jurisprudence, were incalculable. My own innocence I know to be too firmly seated in conscience, too strongly fortified by its internal strength, and too well guarded by external evidence, to fear either secret sap or open assault; and it shall not be my fault if any transgressions against the wholesome rules of judicial practice be drawn into precedent hereafter.

My own reason informed me, and the clear and decided authority of every approved author who had treated of the elements or practice of military law, was united with undeviating unanimity in pronouncing that every alleged offence against military law, as against the general law of the land, must be determined by some fixed and known rule of action, instituted by positive law; and defining the character and degree of the offence; and that it must be shown by the terms of the accusation to be cognizable and punishable under such law. The grounds and principles upon which this proposition may be demonstrated, and by which the present accusation, after having that test applied to its terms, is necessarily excluded from the legal cognizance of the court, have been amply unfolded in the preliminary exceptions taken by my counsel to the second charge and its specifications. In the answer to these exceptions, the undisputed power of the Executive to discharge from service any officer holding under its appointment, in other words, to revoke a commission granted during pleasure, is adverted to. It is intimated that this power has been exercised, and may be again, to protect the Executive from the contumelies of its subordinate officers; that, in this instance, the Executive was under no necessity to have remitted me to a court martial for trial; but might have judged and punished me by its own inherent jurisdiction, and upon the responsibility of its discretionary powers; and that, having this inherent power and jurisdiction, it has, by the act of preferring these charges, pronounced its own opinion of my conduct; and has required of this court nothing more than to inquire and ascertain whether the acts, of which it is to be taken for granted, from the official exhibition of the charge, that I am guilty, may be explained or palliated by any circumstance of excuse or mitigation. Then, if I may rightly comprehend this reasoning, this court is now exercising a jurisdiction ex gratia; as a mere concession from the Executive, without any necessary and legal cognizance of the matter, and, instead of a grave tribunal of criminal judicature, commissioned to pronounce the solemn judgments of the law upon the guilt or innocence of a prisoner accused of high offences against the law, we have an anomalous sort of inquest or council of ceremonies, which is to report to some superior authority every breach of decorum or good breeding, from boorish rudeness to the slightest deviation from obsequious respect, by which fastidious pride or apprehensive delicacy might be offended. In that view no punishment is to be inflicted by the judgment of this court, but the case is to be again remitted to the Executive for him to decide, from the circumstances reported by this court, upon the expediency of exerting his power to remove me from office. It is further implied, if not laid down in terms, that the Executive requires not the opinion of this court, whether the facts specified under the second charge be true, nor whether they do, in themselves, amount to "insubordinate conduct, and conduct unbecoming an officer;" both the fact and the corollary being already established by the opinion of the Executive, manifested in the exhibition of the charge; and the function of this court being limited to a report of any circumstances of excuse or mitigation to be offered on my part. Still, the argument of the judge advocate, in answer to the exceptions taken by my counsel, concludes with a clear and unhesitating opinion, that the charge and specifications are not only sufficient in substance and form, but that they do specify offences of a military character, for which the accused may be arraigned and tried before a court-martial. Whether punishment be understood to be involved in the arraignment and trial here spoken of, or to be deferred to the Executive discretion, so as to reduce arraignment and trial to a mere inquisition of circumstances of excuse and mitigation, or whether a judicial power to try and punish, concurrent with the Executive power to judge, summarily upon view, and to punish by removal from office, be affirmed, are questions which it would be difficult to determine by any lights in the preliminary exposition, that has been elicited, of the principles upon which the jurisdiction of this court may attach itself to the case.

Having still to grope my way through a dubious twilight, to a knowledge of what may constitute the gist of my offence, and the essence of my accusation, in point both of law and of fact, I must proceed, by the help of anticipations and conjectures of the point of attack, to defend myself the best I may on every ground.

Though I had yielded my conviction, with such absolute confidence, to the force and conclusiveness of the reasons by which the preliminary exceptions of my counsel to the sufficiency of the second charge and its specifications, had been sustained, yet I should not have been in the least disconcerted, nor, as I imagine, materially curtailed of my defence, if such exception had been overruled by any new and unexpected arguments, which the learning and ability enlisted against me, might have suggested in answer. I should, without regret, have given undisputed sway to the philological and legal disquisitions which were supposed to have furnished such victorious arguments in support of the charge and specifications excepted to. But when I found myself assailed by a species of argumentum ad hominem, digressing into circumstances foreign to the point in question; and proceeding upon the most extraordinary misapprehension of my language and conduct, and of the motives inferred from them, I could not forbear to discharge myself from the imputations, and to disclaim the inferences that might have resulted from this official and recorded misconstruction of my conduct and motives.

I adhere, with undiminished confidence, to the propositions of law, which have been stated and illustrated by my counsel, to acquit me of any necessity to answer the second charge and its specifications; but before I advert to the grounds upon which they are either maintained or contested, I must be permitted to pass, very briefly, under review, the collateral topics of disparagement, which have been brought in aid of the argument against them.

1st. As an evidence of my disposition to raise captious and futile objections, if not of my want of candor, it has been stated that I had complained, on the first day of the court, of not having been served with a copy of the charges and specifications; and yet, the next day, I produced a copy with which I had been regularly served, and which differed from that upon which I had been arraigned only in two letters. The fact is well remembered, that I gave as a reason for demanding a fresh copy of the charges and specifications, a difference I had discovered between the copy read and that in my possession; and my written explanation the next day, which I hope forms a part of the record, minutely explains the difference between the two. Nor is the stated result of the minute calculation, which reduces the variance to a mere difference of two letters in the spelling of a word, by any means correct or fair. The variance, (no matter of how many letters or words it consisted,) was in the date of one of my letters, specified as "insubordinate and disrespectful." The letters were no otherwise specified or identified than by a naked reference to dates; the one copy of the specification gave a letter of one date, the other copy omitted that, and gave a letter of another date; and so the variance consisted not in the difference between the spelling of thirtieth and thirteenth, but in the entire letter, which constituted one of the documents of the charge: and in one sense, may answer to the result of the judge advocate's calculation of a difference of two letters. But if it be true, as has been suggested, that the only office of the court in this trial, is to offer propitiation to another authority, by which I stand already condemned, upon the strict law and fact, how hopeless the task of exculpation or excuse, if the spirit in which the charges have been instituted, be consentaneous with that by which they are prosecuted to judgment. For here I am charged with litigiousness, illiberality and want of candor, because I had simply pointed out an important defect in the procedure against me; all the advantage from which I had voluntarily waived, and had conceded to the prosecution and election to adapt either or both of the letters referred to in the two copies of the specification, only requiring that the election should then be definitively made.

2d. I am also represented as having appealed to the judge advocate to withdraw the second charge, and even to have followed up that application with some intimation sounding in menace, and it is thought necessary gravely to expound the relative powers and duties of the judge advocate, from which any discretionary authority to withdraw a charge is excluded. The only circumstance from which I am given to understand that this attempt to escape from the prosecution, either by the lenity or the fears of those who were to uphold it has been inferred, was a simple appeal made by my counsel, purely out of the courtesy usual on such occasions to the candor of the judge advocate, as the law adviser of the court, upon the validity of the exceptions to the second charge.

As I, and every person present, with whom I have comparad notes, most distinctly and clearly understood the passage of the transaction alluded to; my counsel was insisting upon the right to the reply, if, contrary to his expectation, any answer should be offered to the reasons advanced in support of his exception to the charge and specifications; and, after explaining that, according to all judicial practice, the right of reply lay with that party who had originated the motion, and supported it by an opening argument, he qualified his application to the court, by saying that he really did not anticipate a necessity for any such reply in that instance, as he entertained a very confident hope and expectation, that the judge advocate, when he should have deliberately considered the question, would candidly admit the force of the objections, instead of attempting to answer them, and would abandon the charge and specifications as untenable.

Why such an appeal to the candor of an opponent should be abhorrent to the principles upon which this prosecution is conducted, concerns only him or them to whom the conduct of the prosecution is entrusted. I ask no favors, no concession; nothing, in short, but the strictest debt of justice, cast up by the hardest reckoning; nor have I ever desired to wrest it from any withholder by other than the moral force of law and justice. As to the menace, so strangely surmised, it is said to be inferred from some expression in the written argument of my counsel. Whatever be the exceptionable passage in that document, it now stands recorded for the condemnation or acquittal of its author; and dispenses me from any explanation, further than that I have looked in vain for the passage from which any mind, not afflicted with an extreme susceptibility of offence, could have inferred a menace. Every well-wisher to the credit and success of this prosecution must hope, that its character for nerve and determination, should rest upon some less equivocal evidence than the power to withstand the instances of this shadowy phantom of a menace. As yet, certainly no infirmity of purpose, in the course of the prosecution, has given ground for any doubt, either of the active courage or the passive fortitude by which it is upheld; and I shall be the last to undervalue the efficacy of the tremendous ordeal to which those high qualities seem to have been voluntarily destined, by the manner in which they are exerted upon this occasion.

3d. I am also charged with having taken refuge under nice cavils of law and grammar; with having taken advantage of verbal criticisms and legal technicalities, to escape the legitimate consequences of the charge; and with having manifested more dread of punishment, than sensibility to character; as if I were willing to go forth acquitted by the judgment of the law, but condemned by the moral sense of mankind; unpunished in person, but tarnished in fame. To little purpose, indeed, have I so long lived and acted in the public eye, if there exist a man who could, in his heart, entertain the suspicion that I could incur any more grievous punishment in this life, than a degraded name, or could aspire to any higher reward than a pure conscience and a spotless reputation. But if it were otherwise, and it were true, that I could have been reproached with a design to escape investigation, by resting upon my legal advantage, it is without precedent, I believe, either in England or in this country, that the law officer of the government, charged with the conduct of a public prosecution, should have attempted to affix a stigma to the character of the accused as a substitute for legal conviction and punishment; or if there be any instance either among the crown lawyers of England, or the law officers of the United States, of any such gratuitous infliction upon the feelings of the accused, it has been held up as a beacon to be reprobated and avoided, rather than as an example to be followed. The humane dictate of public justice, in every such case, is that the law and its ministers either judicially acquit, or judicially condemn without qualification; whom the law acquitteth, its ministers presume not to condemn; but for every moral offence, without the cognizance of vindicitive justice, the party is remitted to his conscience, and to the bar of public opinion. But in this case, my exception to the charge turned upon the utter absence of any imputation of either legal or moral guilt; and upon the vague and unintelligible phraseology of its terms; or, in so far as any intelligible point of accusation could be deduced from it, that it hinged upon minute and frivolous fault-findings, altogether beneath the dignity of judicial animadversion. And now that this long rod of investigation has had its full swing; unlimited by time, place, or circumstance; every anticipation of the frivolousness and want of gravity, in the essential matter of the charge, is more than verified in the event.

Before I proceed to discuss the several specifications in their order, I must beg permission to advert to some of the points discussed in the argument of the exception taken by my counsel to the second charge and its specifications, and which are left in a state not a little perplexing to me.

It has been insisted that these exceptions could not be received, as in the nature of a motion to quash an indictment or information, but as a demurrer to an indictment, which, if overruled in law, conclusively admits the fact.

Now how the analogy between these exceptions and a demurrer at common law is to be brought about, is, as I apprehend, wholly incomprehensible. No authority, upon the law and practice of courts-martial, has the most remote allusion to any such form of pleading, as a demurrer. The only pleas ever used, are said to be one of three; namely: the general issue of not guilty; or a former acquittal; or a former conviction of the same offence. A technical demurrer, to be followed, if overruled in law, by the consequence of an exclusive admission of the fact, is peculiar to the practice of the courts of common law; and it is believed has no precedent or analogy in the practice of any other courts, or in the rules of any other system of jurisprudence. In the courts of the civil or Roman law, a form of proceeding, giving to the party every advantage of a demurrer, was used under the name of exceptions, which were either peremptory or declinatory, according as they went to the substance or the form of the action. But if such exceptions were overruled, they were never held as admissions of the fact; but the party excepting was still permitted to go on to the contestation of suit, which was equivalent to the general issue in courts of common law, and then the whole merits were discussed. So the courts of equity, which both in their forms of procedure, and principles of jurisprudence, had been modeled more after the civil than the common law, adopted the form and the name of the demurrer, discharged of its common law consequence of standing as a conclusive admission of the fact, when overruled in point of law; so that under the name of a demurrer, the exceptions, peremptory or declinatory, in the courts of civil law, are essentially preserved, and the demurrant is left at large, in his answer upon all matters of fact. Now in courts-martial, where demurrers, as a form of pleading, are wholly unknown, it must be extremely difficult to find any analogy, which shall answer their legal consequences to exceptions. So in the published state trials before the court of session in Scotland, where the civil law prevails, we find the advocates for the panel, or accused, pleading to the libel, before they join issue on the fact; and when their plea to the libel, (analogous to the exceptions of the civilians, and to the demurrer of the common lawyers,) is overruled, they still go on to plead to the fact. That the accused in all courts, and under all systems, should have the means and opportunity, in some form, to question the legal sufficiency of the charge itself, is indispensable to the due administration of justice; and that in courts-martial, which are supposed by Mr. Tytler, to be more analogous in their constitution and forms of procedure, to the courts of the civil than of the common law, such exceptions should be admitted upon the terms usually practiced in the great majority of judicial tribunals, rather than adopt any narrow, technical, and peculiar practice of one set of courts, is but reasonable. Indeed the question of practice should be decided by the fact that a demurrer never has been admitted among the pleas, available in a court-martial. The truth is, that in criminal cases the demurrer is entirely disused in the courts of common law, because every advantage of a demurrer is then obtained, either by a motion to quash the indictment, or to arrest the judgment, without any danger of being concluded to the fact, if found to be mistaken in the law. The exceptions to the legal sufficiency of a charge in a court-martial is more analogous to a motion to quash, than to a demurrer; and in this case it is made expressly and specifically as a motion to quash. It must be a very curious process of analogical ratiocination, by which this motion is to be converted into a technical demurrer. It is said that a motion to quash is not entertained where the jurisdiction is for certain grave offences, but only when some of the lighter class of offences are charged. The reason given is, not that the court has not the same power and jurisdiction to quash in the one case as in the other, but because they will not decide grave and weighty questions in that summary way, but will turn the party over to his motion in arrest of judgment, when the question can be more fully argued and considered. This is a mere notice of practice, founded on the discretion of the court; but before it can operate to convert our exceptions into a technical demurrer, several postulates are demanded.

1. That courts-martial have, in the exercise of a like discretion, distinguished military offences, that are too grave for a motion to quash, and which must be reserved for a motion in arrest of judgment, for such as are light enough in their character to be more summarily disposed of. 2. That the second charge and its specifications do indicate an offence of the graver kind. 3. That if a motion to quash an indictment be overruled, because the offence is of too grave a character to be so summarily disposed of, the court will, of its own authority, convert the motion to quash into a technical indictment, and hold the party to all its consequences. 4. That any process, analogous to a motion in arrest of judgment, can prevail in a court-martial. This is plainly incompatible with the constitution and practice of a court-martial, the members of which unite in their own persons the character both of judge and juror. The motion here spoken of can only prevail in a court where these functions are separate; where the jury first convicts of the fact, and a motion of arrest is interposed between the conviction of the jury, and the judgment of the court.

Then it plainly appears, that a demurrer is a plea wholly unknown to the practice of courts-martial; and that a motion in arrest of judgment would be absurd and impossible. The right to except, in some form, to the legal sufficiency of the charge, is admitted. From all which, it must necessarily follow, that preliminary exceptions, in the form pursued by us, or reserved, under protest, to be considered at some subsequent stage of the trial, is the only practicable or rational cause.

I have been the more particular upon this technical point, because I am at a loss to conjecture how far the consequences of the doctrine, contended for by the judge advocate, may be pushed to my prejudice; and the talents and learning manifest in his argument, make it unsafe to trust too confidently to the apparent conclusiveness of his reasoning, without taking some pains to demonstrate its fallacy. Had it been true, that I could not except to the law, without admitting the fact, it might also have been concluded, that I could not plead to the fact, and proceed to the trial of issue, without admitting the law. In that case, I might have laid myself open to conviction, upon mere proof of the naked fact, that I had written certain letters, or published certain proceedings, though the acts should appear to be ever so innocent, and without any consideration, whatever, of the legal effect of such acts. The judge advocate seems to admit that, at some stage or other of the trial, I may have the advantage of legal exceptions to the charge; but, as he denies that I can have such advantage in the form of preliminary exceptions to the charge, but at the peril of being held to a conclusive admission of the fact; and as I know not how the matter of the exceptions may be any more regularly taken up, or safely or effectually urged, when mixed up with matters of fact, than when separately considered, I have, in this perplexity, thought it most safe and expedient to maintain the original ground of exception.

The more important questions of law, discussed in the argument of the preliminary exceptions to the second charge and its specifications, regarded, 1st, the jurisdiction of this court; as to description, quality and degree of the offences, cognizable by it; and 2dly, the form of the accusation, as to the certainty and precision with which it should bring the offence within the terms of the law, by which it was punished; and the amplitude and minuteness with which the facts and circumstances should be specified.

1st. The proposition that no offence was cognizable by this court, but such as was to be found in the class of offences enumerated and described in the naval articles of war, had been shown to be so demonstrated in principle, and so clearly illustrated by reason and authority, that, until otherwise instructed by an opposing argument, I had concluded it to be placed beyond the reach of controversy. For the proposition itself; and the principles on which it rests, I must refer, with undiminished confidence in its irrefragable strength and conclusiveness, to the illustrations that it has already received from the preceding discussion of it; and now confine myself to some cursory notice of the more prominent objections that have been suggested in the opposing argument of the judge advocate.

It is said, upon the authority of a writer frequently quoted in the course of the discussion, that though no crime, which is mentioned and defined in the articles of war, is punishable in any other manner than in that specially directed by those articles; yet, it does not follow that there are no crimes punishable by a court-martial but such as are enumerated and declared to be punishable by the articles of war; and, that there are offences which admit of no precise definition, and yet, in the military profession, are of the most serious consequence, as weakening and subverting that principle of honor on which the proper discipline of the army must materially depend; that, of these, a court-martial, which is, in the highest sense, a court of honor, are themselves appointed the sole judges, or rather the legislators, for it is in their breasts to define the crime as well as to award the punishment.* Such phrases are indeed to be found in the passages cited from the essay of Mr. Tytler; but they are wholly misapplied when detached from the context and propounded as generalized rules of law. As such, it was with the utmost surprise we heard them ascribed to the authority of Mr. Tytler's essay; so utterly inconsistent as they are with the rules so distinctly and repeatedly propounded by himself, and by three other authors of equal authority—two British and one American. That "the crimes, cognizable by a court-martial, are pointed out by the mutiny act, which every man is, or ought to be, acquainted with;" that "martial law is laid down in so plain and simple a manner, that every military man is, or ought to be, acquainted with what are thereby deemed crimes;" that "in the accusation or charge the offence must be set out with certainty and precision, so as to bring it clearly and unequivocally within the terms of the law or articles of war, by which it is made punishable;" are the terms of the rule, as cited from Mr. Tytler, and the three other authorities, who have all enumerated it with undeviating unanimity.† These wholesome and necessary rules are particularly illustrated and enforced, both by Mr. Tytler himself and by General Macomb, who respectively assign the reasons why it is not necessary, in the body of the charge, to refer to the particular article of war supposed to be violated; which is that "the specification of the criminal act itself is sufficient intimation to the prisoner of the law by which it is punished; and the prisoner may always dispute the relevancy of the charge, and call upon the prosecutor to show in what respect it falls under the prohibition of the law." Well might it have been presumed, therefore, that the text of Mr. Tytler had been wrested from its proper connection and subject, by which the limitations and the application of the passages quoted, would have been determined, when he is represented as ascribing this unlimited jurisdiction to courts-martial, of defining, at pleasure, what acts shall be added to the enumerated list of offences, punishable under the articles of war, and of legislating on the important subject of crimes and punishments. Accordingly, upon reference to the context, we find the whole clearly and rationally explained. In the first passage, which admits the existence of military "crimes punishable by a court-martial, and not enumerated and declared to be punishable by the articles of war," reference is expressly had to the peculiar power granted to the crown by the mutiny act, to make and issue regulations for the army, independent of the established articles of war, and having all the binding force and effect of military law, with certain limitations, as to the extent of the punishment, that may be inflicted under such regulations. The same matter is more fully and clearly explained by Mr. McArthur, who, in his treatise, takes a comparative view of military law, as applied to both the military and naval establishments of Britain. He shows that, while the naval articles of war have been established by successive acts of parliament, from the reign of Charles II to that of George III, and have been digested with unusual care and system, while they are irrepealable and unalterable but by the authority of parliament, and enumerate and define all offences cognizable under them, with the appropriate punishments annexed to them; there is this curious anomaly in respect to the army, which is governed by the articles of war, not instituted by any act of parliament, but at the discretion of the crown, and repealable or alterable at the pleasure of the crown; besides the general power of the crown to superadd the penal regulations, past mentioned. In this respect, the author very justly expatiates upon the advantage which the seamen in the British service have over their brethren in the land service.*

The second passage cited from Mr. Tytler's essay (p. 109) to prove the legislative power of courts-martial, as courts of honor, to define the crime and award the punishment, is equally misapplied to the present argument; and such misapplication is clear from the context, though even, as it stands so connected, its accuracy and precision cannot be entirely defended. He refers these terms expressly to some peculiar and special provisions, found both in the military and naval codes of Britain, but not in our own naval code. The author by no means intends it as the enunciation of a general rule or maxim of military law; but as the result of special enactments, which, it may be remarked, fall somewhat short of the sweeping effect which he ascribes to them. The particular provisions to which he refers, are, 1st, the article of war, which punishes commissioned officers, convicted of behaving in a scandalous, infamous manner, such as is unbecoming the character of an officer and a gentleman; 2dly, the 23d section of the mutiny act, making it "lawful for courts-martial to inflict corporal punishment, not extending to life or limb, on any soldier, for immoralities, misbehavior, or neglect of duty." The same provisions are commented on by McArthur, who, with more accuracy and precision, both of conception and language, explains them as giving to courts-martial a wide discretion, not to define by a legislative act new offences, but to discriminate shades of guilt; and, as it relates to the article by which scandalous and infamous behavior in a commissioned officer is punished, it is further explained that the court should discriminate between such actions as come up to that standard of moral turpitude, and such as, however improper and blamable, fall below it: being cognizable by a court-martial in the one case, and not in the other†—so, in the exceptions taken by my counsel to this charge and its specifications, and in the reasons advanced in support of them, a very considerable discretion, resulting from the vagueness and generality of the terms in which certain military offences were described by the articles of war, and from the power to inflict optional punishments, was conceded to courts-martial. But it was explained to be a sound discretion, instructed by the law, and operating through the law, and essentially different from a legislative power to punish offences not classed and specified by the articles of war. For instance, if an officer be charged with contempt or disrespect, or with contemptuous or disrespectful words, or with scandalous, infamous behavior, or with conduct unbecoming an officer, &c., the court must exercise a sound discretion in discriminating the moral and legal character of the particular acts charged and proved as coming under any of these denominations. It is, nevertheless, absolutely bound by the legal definition of the offence, however general; and, before conviction or punishment could follow, it must judicially determine the acts or words to be contemptuous, or disrespectful, or scandalous and infamous, or unbecoming an officer, &c., and that upon no inferior species of immorality could it judicially animadvert. So that, in effect, the court was exercising the ordinary function of expounding the true intent and operation of a statute from general or doubtful terms—a function only rendered so much the more difficult and perplexing, as the terms were vague or doubtful; and, though the acts that constitute the offence were not defined by the law, yet the offence, as a species, was defined, and the court was bound by that definition. It was also admitted that, in so far as the general heads of offence, laid down in the articles of war, embraced aggravated, though undefined, misconduct, or immoralities, the court, in the exercise of that sound discretion by which the moral character of actions was to be determined, might be viewed as, in some sort, a court of honor, because the actions to be animadverted on were to be judged by rules of honor, and not by strict legal definitions; but, in so judging them, the court was bound by the law to take cognizance only of such improprieties as amounted to the degree of moral turpitude required by the law. The court, it is certain, had the power to adjudge anything scandalous and infamous; but then, its solemn judgment must be, and that upon the responsibility of its judicial character and oath, that the act was scandalous, infamous, &c. If any inferior degree, or higher shade, of misconduct or immorality, should be so determined, it must rest upon the conscience of the court as a misjudgment and an abuse of the law. In short, the law had, in general terms, defined the species, the quality and degree, of the offence, and it was the duty of the court, before it condemned or punished, to see that the facts came up to the legal definition, ample as was the field of judgment and discretion, in respect of the infinite variety of actions, and the nice and diversified shades of their moral character, which might be embraced in the general terms of the definition. It has been remarked, that the only part of our naval code from which this function of a court of honor can be, in any sense, inferred, is the third naval article of war, which, after enumerating, among the heads of offence punishable by it, oppression, cruelty, fraud, &c., ends with the sweeping clause of "any other scandalous conduct, tending to the destruction of good morals."* The more vague and general description of "immoralities, misbehavior, or neglect of duty," punishable in a soldier, under the mutiny act of Britain; or of "conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman," punishable under the military articles of war, in this country, are wholly omitted in our naval code; nor is there to be found in it any such article as "scandalous, infamous behavior, unbecoming the character of an officer and gentleman," which is common both to the military and naval codes of Britain; but this third article of our naval code is nearly modeled after the second article in that of Britain.† Upon the principles already laid down, it was conceived to be clear that this court, as a court of honor, judging the moral character of actions under this article, could take no cognizance of any that fell short of the aggravated degree of misconduct supposed by the article; namely, "scandalous conduct, tending to the destruction of good morals," and at least of as grave import as the preceding enumeration of "oppression, cruelty, fraud, &c." But it has been asked by my counsel, and I ask again, what is there in the charge, or in any one of the specifications, that imputes, either directly or by inference, any act within the jurisdiction of a court of honor, or which may not, and ought not to be the subject of special enactment, if it be thought that sound policy and the good of the service, required that they should be brought under the judicial cognizance of a court-martial? This question was put in reference to the terms of the accusation; I now put it in reference to the proofs; and challenge the severest test for every word and deed which the minute industry of the prosecution, stimulated by provocations, real or supposed, has been able to call up against me. Whatever errors, or inadvertencies, or indiscretions, it may please them to impute to me, let any one word or deed be pointed out, as approaching in the remotest degree to the character of scandalous conduct; or, as in any other sense, soliciting the animadversion of a court of honor. I understand, this legislative power, over the subject of military crimes and punishments, to be claimed for the court, not only in its imputed capacity of a court of honor, but in right of a general jurisdiction extending to every sort of transgression, which, according to sound and discreet views of policy and expediency, ought to be repressed as tending, immediately or remotely, to the relaxation of discipline, and which the good of the service requires to be punished as military offences. I shall not stop to dilate upon the nature or consequences of a doctrine so abhorrent to the first principles of civil and military polity: these topics have been amply treated, by my counsel, in reference to military, as distinguished from civil life. I shall, therefore, confine myself to a brief notice of the single authority, upon which this most extraordinary doctrine, has been advanced; namely, the 32d of our naval articles of war, declaring that "all crimes committed by persons belonging to the navy, which are not specified in the foregoing articles, shall be punished according to the laws and customs in such cases, at sea." This article is copied with slight variations of phrase, from the 36th of the British naval articles; which, in the concluding member of the sentence, speaks of the laws and customs used at sea.‡ I wonder it had not struck the acute and discriminating mind of the judge advocate, how unlikely it was, that this article could have any relation to the powers or jurisdictions of courts-martial, since all the authors who have, with more or less of labor and minuteness, treated of the law and practice of such courts, or of military law in general, have preserved an absolute silence on the effect of this article. From that circumstance, connected with the very unusual and almost singular omission in the body of the article, of any reference to a court-martial, the inference should have been quite obvious that it alluded to a class of offences, and to set off "laws and customs," not within the ordinary cognizance of a court-martial: and in fact it has always been understood, as referring to certain recognized laws and customs, necessary for the minuter departments of police and discipline at sea, and having no necessary connection with the enumerated and defined subjects that come under the regular cognizance of courts-martial. The history and practice of courts-martial, both in Britain and in this country, may, it is believed, be examined in vain for a single instance of any charge being exhibited or tried, under that article. But if it were otherwise, what argument does the article furnish in support of the proposition which it is cited to prove; namely, that the court may assume the function, both of legislators and judges? The article gives the court no power to define or to decide what acts shall be held to be criminal under it, but on the contrary, refers to known and established rules by which the same are already supposed to be defined and determined, namely, "the laws and customs used at sea." These may be unwritten laws, a sort of common law of the navy, contradistinguished from its statute law, as comprised in the naval articles of war, but they are nevertheless supposed to be fixed, known and obligatory, and this court if it have any jurisdiction of them, can act upon no case that is not shown to have been already constituted an offence by these laws and customs; they must be proved and ascertained, or known to the breasts of the court, as establishing the criminal character of the act charged, and the nature and degree of the punishment incurred by it. Besides, what can the laws and customs used at sea possibly have to do with any matter either set forth or proved under the second charge and its specifications, which relate exclusively to transactions on shore, in the heart of the country and not in the execution or routine of any naval duty or service whatever? If these laws and customs be known to the judge advocate or to the court, let them be expounded and applied to the terms of the charge and specifications, or to the facts proved: if unknown, let old and experienced commanders versed in the traditionary lore of marine law be examined, to identify and explain them. They must be known before any act can be punished as an offence against them. In the absence of such knowledge, they cannot be supplied by any discretion, judicial or legislative in this court. The judge advocate has referred to the common law as defining and punishing murder and other crimes, without the help of statute law, and certainly it never entered into the conception, either of my counsel or myself, that any objection or argument which had been urged on my part, rested on any distinction of the form of the law by which the offence was supposed to have been created and punished, nor is it quite obvious what argument the punishment of offences at common law may furnish for the assumption of a legislative discretion, by a court-martial, to punish anything as a crime which may appear to be mischievous or dangerous to the service, from any analogy to the jurisdiction of the common law courts. The analogy is wholly against the argument, for the common law is just as positive, limited, and fixed a rule of action, as the statute law, and the very fact of the coexistence of the two, proves that the courts arrogate no extension of jurisdiction bordering on legislative discretion, from the unwritten or prescriptive authority of the common law, but on the contrary, when the public good requires any innovation on the established and defined boundaries of the common law, or any extension or modification of its terms, a recourse to the legislature to supply its defects by statutory enactment becomes necessary. Then if there be a common law of the navy, implied by these laws and customs used at sea, let it be exemplified and applied to my case with the same certainty and precision as the common law to murder or other offences defined and punished by it.

2d. The question on the form of the accusation was supposed to have been settled by a concurrence of so many and such pointed authorities, all coinciding with the plainest dictates of justice, and with the most indispensable safeguards of individual right and security, as to leave little or nothing to be said on the subject. There seemed to be little occasion, either in the general principles propounded, or in their application to the present case, for any strictures upon the mischievous consequences of permitting an evasion of justice, by means of nice and technical objections to form, or of captious verbal criticism. It would have been more to the point to have shown how the objections urged on my behalf, were too nice or technical, or required more than was necessary or usual to the wholesome forms of judicial procedure; and how the exceptions to the precision, or legal or grammatical accuracy of the terms in which the offence was described, and the facts specified were too nice and technical; or how they descended to the captiousness of verbal criticism without affecting the substantial sense and meaning of the charge. It has been thought to be as obvious to the philosophical as to the professional and practical observer, upon the principles of a regular and discreet jurisprudence, that it was far more just and safe to compel ministers of the law to care and precision in the forms of procedure, than to set them loose from every wholesome restraint. The necessity and value of these landmarks to human rights are enforced, no less by the rules of criminal judicature in military than in civil tribunals: the theory in both is precisely the same, and the practice assimilated by the closest analogy. One of the most celebrated and useful of the authors who have treated of the law and practice of courts-martial, has not failed to insist upon the comparative mischiefs arising from a disregard of, or a strict adherence to established forms; and to demonstrate the wide-spread and incalculable evils resulting from the one, and the very partial and occasional inconveniences from the other.* This is followed by the distinct enumeration and clear definition of all those reasonable and proper rules, by which the form of accusations exhibited before courts-martial is determined; and which are so repeatedly insisted on, and strenuously recommended by the same author, and numerous other authorities cited in the course of the former discussion. The summary of these rules, as given upon that occasion, and amply supported by reason and authority, says, "the offence must be set out in such terms as bring it clearly and unequivocally within the law, or articles of war, by which it is made punishable, so that there shall appear a certainty of an offence in the charge; and, in some instances, it must be charged in the very words of the article or statute supposed to be violated, and all the circumstances of the time, place, and manner of the acts charged, must be minutely described in the specifications; and the more vague and general the article of war by which the offence is described and punished, so much the more particular and minute must be the specification. An indictment or criminal information in the courts of common law, or, as some prefer, a libel in the courts of the civil law is referred to as the lowest admissible standard of the certainty, precision, and particularity required in an accusation before a court-martial."† By all this, it is by no means to be understood that the mere solemnities and technical forms of such pleadings are requisite; but those substantial parts that go to inform the party accused circumstantially and certainly, of what it is that he is called to answer. Upon a comparison of these prescribed requisites of a valid accusation, with the actual charge and specifications in question, the utter failure of the latter under the test was obvious and palpable.

But there were not wanting expedients to evade the force of an objection, unanswerable, as I think, in its terms. But the generality of the charge, (it was said on the authority of Mr. Tytler,) although it may not be absolutely reprobated by the military law, or amount to avoidance or annulling of the indictment, affording, in every case, a competent and weighty objection upon the part of the prisoner, which he may urge, to the effect of having the charge rendered special, by a pointed detail from the prosecution of the particular facts on which it is founded; and this requisition by the prisoner, which is founded in material practice, no court-martial can legally refuse; "‡the hypothetical and qualified terms which thus indicate a process for botching the defects in the original frame of the charge, are assumed as absolute; and as ruling that such defect" is not absolutely reprobated by the military law, and does not amount to a voidance or annulling of the indictment; "that a more precise and special statement of the matter of the charge is merely recommended as of favor, not required as of indispensable obligation, and it is concluded that the proper time and mode for me to have taken advantage of the objection, was before I had pleaded, and then to have called on the judge advocate for the pointed detail of particular facts on which the charge was founded" a "requisition (it seems) founded in material justice, and which no court-martial can legally refuse." Be it so; but it has entirely escaped observation that this remedy applies to only half my objection; that it is limited in terms to the generality of the charge and specifications; and has nothing to do with so much of the objection as turns upon the inaccurate, confused, and absolutely unmeaning terms in which the charge itself is couched. An indictment or other form of accusation may be extremely objectionable for its generality, while its meaning may be manifested by language quite grammatical, clear and intelligible. "It is also somewhat perplexing to comprehend why the court-martial cannot legally refuse the requisition for this" pointed detail of particular facts; if there be legal obligation on the prosecutor to "prevent the objection," and the consequent necessity for such a requisition, by avoiding the original fault that is to produce them.

It might further be asked, upon what authority this requisition is restricted to the time of arrangement before plea; especially a plea admitted under a protest, reserving the identical exception; and why the evident defects of the charge and specifications, have not, when so repeatedly complained of, been amended; as might have been done with a tithe of the pains and labor bestowed upon the justification of them?

But this mode of evading the force of the objection, by proposing a succedaneum, was anticipated and effectually obviated, in the preliminary argument by which the objections were maintained. It was shown that the rule did not rest upon the general law and practice of courts-martial only, cogent and conclusive as were the authorities by which such law and practice had been ascertained; but that it had been incorporated and consolidated with the mass of our naval articles of war, and so had acquired all the force and authority of positive enactment. For this the 38th article was referred to, which expressly requires that "the person accused be furnished with a true copy of the charges, with the specifications, at the time he is put under arrest," and makes them afterwards unalterable but upon certain extraordinary contingencies, specially stated in the body of the article.* Now as the full import and meaning of the term specifications, had been determined by the precedent law and practice of courts-martial, it must be held to have been adopted by Congress according to its technical import; and to have had precisely the same effect, as if Congress had descended to more minute legislation; and had in terms, required all the "pointed detail of particular facts," which it seems a court-martial could not have legally refused to enforce, when properly required. Mr. Tytler, in the very passage which is relied upon as conceding the practice of amending the charge after the court has assembled for the trial of it, clearly excepts charges under a particular article of war, in which it was thought just, on account of the generality of its terms expressly to require specifications: and he very hesitatingly yields to the inference, that because they are not expressly required under the other articles, the omission is not fatal and incurable under any other; "may not amount to a voidance or annulling of the indictment." Indeed the practice of altering the charge after the court has assembled, is directly contrary to the general rule stated by all the authorities before cited; and the few precedents that have formed exceptions to it, are stated as very questionable in principle.

The answer offered to this argument is curious. It is said that this statutory rule, requiring specifications, and forbidding a subsequent alteration of the charge was introduced for the benefit and advantage of the person accused, who is always competent to renounce it; and if he desires more minute specifications, he must renounce the rule and permit the amendment. So a rule introduced for the benefit of the person accused, and of imperative obligation upon the prosecutor, is violated to the disadvantage and injury of the person accused; but he cannot except to such illegal violation of the rule, unless he agrees to purge his adversary's fault, by renouncing the very right that has been invaded. If this be not a virtual repeal of the law, why, the chasm in the chain of cause and effect is utterly imperceptible to my common sense.

The rationale of this rule, and its highly beneficial character, were illustrated by the citation of another, vouched by the same authorities, and designed for the same beneficial end, namely: that which required that the person accused, should be furnished with a list of the witnesses to be adduced against him, together with a copy of the charge, in order to enable him not only to make the best preparation to meet the facts to be adduced against him, but also to invalidate the testimony of the witnesses, if practicable. The concurring authority of the four authors already cited, is unceremoniously set aside by some posthumous notes of the late judge advocate general of England, introduced into the preface to the last edition of Mr. Tytler's essay. But a more careful examination of these notes will show that the rule is not denied as one of general, but of universal application, and that nothing more than its relaxation in certain excepted cases, is insisted on.

But against all the force of general learning and authority, confirmed by statutory enactment, numerous examples of the actual form of charges and specifications, tried before our courts-martial, have been industriously collected. And for what purpose? Is it imagined that any positive number of bad precedents, silently creeping into practice, and never having received the sanction of a judicial confirmation, can be competent to overrule a rule, a law so positive and so authentically vouched? The authors who have laid down the rule and illustrated its utility and necessity, all advert to certain partial violations of it, which are not cited as precedents, but as examples of irregular practice to be avoided. It is true that the precedents collected by the judge advocate, seem, for the most part, to be extremely defective in minuteness and precision of specification; but by how many degrees do they excel the present charge in legal precision and propriety of phrase. There is scarce one of them but charges in direct terms some heinous offence; scandalous falsehood; forged letters; malicious, false, and scandalous libels, &c., &c. But, whatever be the character of these precedents, they cannot be opposed to a well-defined and positive rule of law, but may only serve to illustrate the necessity of enforcing it.

The argument of inconvenience is called in aid, and voluminous documents with which upon our plan it would have been necessary to stuff the specifications are insisted on, as if so necessary and beneficial a rule of law were to give way in order to save the prosecutor the trouble of writing. But this objection is merely fanciful. It was only necessary to have specified the passages in the letters and other papers complained of as disrespectful or untrue, with the same particularity and conciseness as in an indictment or declaration for a libel.

These exceptions were, in the first instance, urged on my part under a firm conviction that they were unanswerable; having embarked in them, their importance required that they should be sustained. I have felt no other solicitude, as they relate to my own particular case, but to avoid being unwarily entrapped by vague and ambiguous phrases into such a dilemma as that the court should feel itself compelled to find the fact against me of writing or publishing what I never denied, without the necessity of imputing to it any specific degree of legal or moral impropriety.

I shall now proceed to a cursory and brief consideration of the charge and specifications in their order, as connected with the evidence.

Charge 2. The analysis that has already been made of the terms of this charge, and the manifest failure of every attempt to expound from them any intelligible meaning, far less a precise charge of any specific act, punishable under the naval articles of war, may dispense me from any other notice of it than a few explanatory remarks. When exception was taken to the new-coined or new-compounded adjective, "insubordinate," nothing was less intended than nice verbal criticism; and after all that has been said, the practice of so characterizing the criticisms upon the present application of the terms is not perceived. Nor was there any idea of denying absolutely the propriety on proper occasions, and with the necessary skill of introducing words with new forms of composition; or with any other impress of a new coinage. The lawfulness of such coinage, and the rules by which it should be governed, have been too long established by a celebrated production of a witty and poetical critic of antiquity to be now questioned: though it must be confessed that the dry and solemn details of an indictment or criminal charge do not furnish the happiest occasion, or the most legitimate subject for such adventurous essays. Neither the propriety in general of the arbitrary composition of a noun with a privative particle, when the writer desired to express some quality of contrariety to the primitive noun, nor the callida punctura of insubordinate, when applied to the same philosophical ideas as the primitive adjective, was called in question. The gist of the objection was that subordinate had never acquired by well established use, nor even by any use, popular or technical, any meaning different from that affixed to it in philosophical and literary language: that such meaning was utterly unappropriate and incompetent to denote the presence of any military or other virtue in an individual: consequently, the new and arbitrary composition of the word with the privative particle, (unknown to any vocabulary of the language, and without any fixed or known meaning beyond the mere contrariety of its primitive) was equally unappropriate, and incompetent to express the presence of any military or other vice or crime in an individual. What connection this may have with the speculative and impracticable notion, censured by Professor Stewart, of cramping and impoverishing written and oral language, by repudiating every signification not deducible from the radical or primitive sense of words, as species of the same genus, is not so obvious. A conjecture was indulged that "insubordinate conduct" might possibly have been intended as a paraphrase of another term, which was likewise to be formed by the composition of a noun with a privative particle, and that was insubordination; and no other appropriate or intelligible meaning could be inferred from the application of that term to the matter of the charge but disobedience of orders, which made it identical with the first charge, and stripped it of all relation to and support from the specifications annexed to it. The judge advocate has seized upon the identity of "insubordinate conduct," and "insubordination," but by what analogy is not explained. The substantive subordination is admitted to have acquired a more extended meaning in military language, than in philosophical language, or literary composition, and one very remotely if at all deducible from its radical or primitive sense, while the adjective "subordinate" is invariably used in military language, as in all admissible usage, with the strictest analogy to its radical sense; and therefore the adjective, whether simple or compounded, being so confined to its radical sense, cannot be made to denote the new and extended signification of the substantive, either in its simple or compounded form. Numerous authorities are cited to prove that subordination is established by general and approved usage, as applied both to military individuals and to military bodies collectively: and some authorities for insubordination applied to military bodies collectively; and the great aim of all this learned and laborious research is to prove that subordination has other significations, in relation to military matters, than mere obedience to orders. Doubtless it is used in a variety of senses in reference to military matters. When applied to collective bodies, it indicates the regular series and gradation of ranks, and the principle of cohesion and organization that preserves them in their order. In that sense it is opposed to anarchy or disorganization, and in that sense it is utterly unappropriate and incompetent, either simple or compounded, to denote the presence or absence of any military crime or offence in an individual. The only possible application of it that can express such an idea is to an individual of a military body, and the only quality it can predicate of him, at all to the purpose of the present charge, is obedience or disobedience of orders.

The judge advocate rejects this signification, as reducing the two charges to a state of absolute identity of meaning and effect; and yet, after all the long and devious huntings after a meaning, no precise or definite one, different from this, is suggested. The argument in support of the charge, highly creditable as it is in other respects to the learning and ingenuity of its author, is just as void of precision and of specific intent in its conclusions, as the charge itself.

I submit it, without further remark, to the judgment of the court, whether the second charge be not so indefinite and so incapable of any appropriate meaning from which a criminal offence may be inferred, as to strip it of all efficacy as a charge under which any judicial trial may be had. The charge falling, every specification depending on it falls with it, as of course. I desire, nevertheless, to be indulged with a few remarks upon the merits of each of the specifications.

Specification first. If the strictures upon the terms of the charge itself be at all founded, this specification must be clearly untenable; while, on the other hand, a successful argument in support of the general charge would not help the specification. For, after it shall be made to appear that "insubordinate conduct," predicated of a moral agent, is equivalent to "insubordination," and so denotes some military offence in such agent, it must still remain an enigma what "insubordinate character" means when predicated of a letter. The moral agent may commit a breach of subordination by writing a letter when forbidden, or not writing when commanded; but what positive quality of subordination or insubordination may inhere in the letter itself, is the mystery.

The "insubordinate character" charged upon these letters is altogether unintelligible and absurd; their "disrespectful character" too vague and uncertain to produce any legal consequences. Disrespect, in any form of words, written or oral, is not recognized as a species of offence in the naval, as it is in the military, articles of war. If the latter, it was defined and limited by a specific enumeration of the personages to whom the offence might be offered; and from that enumeration the Secretary of War is excluded; and there could be no possible reason why the feelings of the one Secretary should be held any more sacred and inviolate than the other; still less that the naval articles should have interpolated in them a new and fanciful species of offence, merely for the sake of placing the one of these officers upon a footing of pre-eminence over the other. The naval articles punished contempt to a superior officer while in the exercise of the duties of his office; no species of disrespect short of contempt, so manifested, could be punishable under these articles. Contempt, so manifested, implied something more than mere words; it implied either acts or words attended by the practical consequence of impeding or insulting a superior officer in the very act of discharging his duty; it stood next in degree to mutinous words. What should constitute disrespect, either in a verbal or written communication, is altogether arbitrary, depending upon etiquette in many instances, and upon certain minute observances wholly beneath the gravity of judicial notice. What might be entirely unexceptionable on one occasion, might be highly disrespectful on another. Besides, the Secretary of the Navy, if he be intended as the person to whom these letters were disrespectful, does not stand in the relation of superior officer contempleted by the naval articles of war, which evidently refer to the gradations and relations of mere military rank. The Secretary of the Navy is exclusively a civil officer, without military rank, or other connection with it than as the organ of communication between the Executive and the officers of the navy.

But, after all, what is there disrespectful to anybody in these letters? They complain of real or supposed grievances. They freely remonstrate, it is true; and when officers of the navy or army may not do that with impunity they must be abject indeed, if not debased. The military articles of war expressly authorize the appeal of the meanest soldier, and so through all the gradations of military rank, when he thinks himself wronged. Then any officer or soldier of the army may complain of wrong from his immediate superior, without offence; and what shall restrain an officer of the navy from complaining and remonstrating against alleged injustice? The question is not now triable by this court, whether I were well grounded in my complaint, but whether it were urged in indecent or abusive language.

The examples of free and uncensured complaint and remonstrance from military men to or against their superiors, are numerous in the services of this country and of Europe. If I were called upon to explain or justify the tone of complaint indicated by the correspondence now produced, I should be at no loss to specify such reasons as, upon the coolest reflection, I still think well founded.

The manner of my recall, so incommensurate, as I then knew, and as I still know, with the merits of my conduct, which, if it had been as well understood then as it must be now, I do verily believe would have been applauded, instead of being censured; the inequality between the treatment I received and that extended to others, under like circumstances; the continuing to hold me up, without investigation, and for so long a time after I tendered myself prepared for the investigation, were all circumstances that bore hard upon my thoughts.

The contrast in the triumphant and magnanimous support of General Jackson against the heaviest and most menacing cloud of discontent, and in the delicate treatment of Captain Cassin (as explained in the order from the Navy Department to me, of the 9th April, 1823), who had the option to come home to explain his conduct, or to transmit a written explanation against grievous complaints (severe and unjust as they were) of the Spanish minister, all conspired to convince me that I had in some way forfeited the favor of the administration. Nor did the administration appear so instantly and spontaneously struck with the enormity of my transgression at Foxardo as to account for my severe treatment; for my official report of the transaction lay for more than three weeks unnoticed in the Department, and my letter of recall bears date on the very day (December 27, 1824) that the inquiry concerning the affair was moved in Congress. Besides, the Secretary's letter to me (April 20, 1825) seems willing to ease off the weight of the blow, by mixing up other causes for my recall. I had, it is true, intimated a conditional wish to be relieved from the command, but I could never have inferred from the tenor of my letter of recall, that it was in any degree caused by such intimation.

I take this occasion to say, that I should despise myself if I were capable of insult or rudeness to a gentleman to whom I stood in my then or present relations to the President, and to the Secretary of the Navy. I should hold it as unmanly to stand mute and awe-struck, when I conceive myself justly entitled to complain. If any passage of my letters could reasonably have borne such a construction, I should have been grieved, and would unhesitatingly have disclaimed the inference.

Specification second. What law or what usage prohibits a public report of the proceeding of any court, after the judicial function on that subject had been executed and the court dissolved? The only possible mode in which an offence can be committed by the publication, in detail, of judicial proceedings, is whilst they are pending, and may be prejudiced by the publication; and in that case the character and degree of the offence is a contempt of court, punishable as a contempt by the identical tribunal whose authority is insulted, and punishable in no other way. The proceedings of the court were necessarily public, but it is allowed that the printing of detailed statements of them, pending the trial, is improper, because it operates practical mischief on that identical proceeding. But when the trial is finished the mischief ceases, and upon the dissolution of the court, the only authority that could have taken cognizance of the offence, had ceased.

Specification third. This specification, in so far as it charges simple inaccuracies in my statement of the proceedings of the court of inquiry, is frivolous in its terms, and it turns out to be still more so in the proof. For, if every variance between the printed report and the record could justly be charged as the mistakes of the former, they were wholly immaterial, and it is too favorable a representation of them to say they were merely verbal, for they even descended into the minutiæ of punctuation and orthography, and even of emphasis, if such may be understood by the term of italicising. The only circumstances that could have given any legal or moral effect to this specification, would have been to charge substantial errors in the printed report, materially varying the sense, and to have charged them as proceeding from a corrupt and malicious motive; but the variances are not proved to have been chargeable to any mistake of mine or my clerks. In the original record, in more than a dozen instances, where erasures appear and words are interlined or added, in a different handwriting from the body of the record, clearly showing alterations to have been made on its face, after it had been fairly transcribed from the original minutes of the judge advocate, my copy reads to the greatest exactness with a fair transcript, before it was altered, retaining all the passages erased, and omitting all those interlined or added. Then there are two evidences in favor of the original correctness of my copy, viz: the clerk who originally transcribed from the judge advocate's minutes, and the clerk who copied for me; from which it clearly appears that these differences were produced, not by the error of my copying clerk, but by alterations of the minutes or record, after my copy had been given out. I presume the judge advocate had a right to make these alterations, and I complain not of them, but I do complain of their being made the ground of a serious charge of incorrectness in my publication. The record contains other circumstantial evidence, most convincing to the same point; but I forbear to enter into further details. One of the most important differences between the two copies consists of an amendment of the original minutes ordered by the court itself, which amendment I inserted in its proper place, and erased the erroneous entry which that amendment should have supplied. Whereas the judge advocate left the original minute to stand as erroneously entered, and entered a minute of the amendment in another place. As to such documents and proceedings as are charged to have been omitted, I accounted for the omission on the face of the publication, by stating I had applied for them but could not obtain them. As to the transposition of the documents, that is explained to mean an inversion of the order in which they had been originally placed and numbered, and needs no remark, as it stands on a level with their errors in grammar, orthography, punctuation, emphasis, &c.

Specification fourth. What is unwarranted by fact, or what disrespectful to the Secretary of the Navy, or the court of inquiry, in any of the remarks, statements, or insinuations here complained of, has never, to this day, been explained. That complaints are made to the Secretary of the Navy, of acts to which he was the organ, is true; that certain proceedings of the court of inquiry are remarked upon, and freely criticised, but in terms wholly unexceptionable. I have not assailed their motives, nor their understandings, but have endeavored to demonstrate certain errors in judgment, that bore hardly, as I conceived, upon my particular case. What may be the standard of the deference and respect due from a military or naval officer to a military or naval court of inquiry, I know not. But this I know, that complaint and remonstrance from persons far more delicately situated towards the persons addressed, and the intercourse between whom is guarded by far more jealous punctilios—I allude to the relation between a military officer and the legislature of his country—and I cite, as an example, the memorial of General Jackson to the Senate, in which he freely and severely censures the proceedings of a committee of inquiry. Let the terms of my complaint be compared with those of General Jackson's memorial, and it will plainly appear how much I kept myself within the allowed limits of complaint. Yet the Senate, after debate and full deliberation, voted the memorial unexceptionable, and ordered it to be printed. And General Jackson lives in the heart of the nation—an honored member of the very Senate which had so magnanimously brooked the freedom of his remonstrance; and only second in the competition for the highest honors of the State.

Specification fifth. This specification, both as stated in terms and as made out in proof, assumes that it is a military offence, punishable by a court-martial, for an officer to make public any communication whatever; no matter how innocent or indifferent, without first obtaining leave. Upon what authority so strange a position is assumed, is not explained, nor may it be easily conjectured. If secrecy be enjoined, either expressly by the terms of the communication, or impliedly by its nature, and the injury to the public service which a disclosure might produce, the publication of it would be highly improper, and, according to circumstances, might bring him in the danger of the legal charge of scandalous conduct. But as to official communications in general, not impressed with this special character of secrecy, there is usually less delicacy or reserve concerning them than is customary with the correspondence of private gentlemen; because the former are, in some sort, public documents, and the same motives of delicacy are not applicable to them. The correspondence here charged as published, without leave, was thought necessary to the exposition of some part of my conduct before the public; and I contend, there was no possible injury to the service from its publication.

Having gone through all the stated charges and specifications, it seems I am called upon to answer some collateral matter, having no manner of connection with the real merits of any question involved in the present trial: unless it be supposed to be a legitimate mode of attack, to eke out the defects of the existing charges and evidence, by throwing the weight of an eminent man's character and opinion into the scale against me. I allude to the deposition of Mr. Monroe, taken without any legal authority, and containing within itself not a tittle of evidence, that can or ought to operate against me with any but the narrow-minded and the servile. In so far as it imports any disapprobation of my conduct, it is by ripping up some old causes of dissatisfaction, which ought not to have had any influence upon the conduct of the late administration in relation to the affair of Foxardo: and if it shall appear that they had such influence, I should rather consider it as furnishing me with new ground of complaint, instead of accumulating or aggravating any of the complaints, whether well or ill-founded, against me. I do infer, in the absence of all explanation of the purposes for which this deposition is adduced, that one of them is to take upon the late President all the responsibility of the various orders from the Navy Department of which I had at different times complained. If this means that I should have complained of the President, instead of the Secretary of the Navy, it implies that what was disrespectful to the head of the Department, would have been quite decorous to the chief magistrate. The truth is, that all my complaints of the manner of my recall, were addressed to the Secretary of the Navy as the regular organ through which I communicated with the administration: and whatever use I made of the personal pronoun in describing the source of the measures complained of, I should have been understood as speaking of the administration collectively. As to the short correspondence between Mr. Monroe and myself in March last, it was with the utmost surprise that I received an intimation during the present trial that it had been deposited in the Navy Department. Not that I mean to complain of its surrender to the purposes of the prosecution, but simply to express my surprise that a correspondence so trivial in itself, and merely personal in its concern, should have received so solemn a destination. Indeed the inoffensiveness of its contents serve to show how securely I might challenge investigation, since the most unscrupulous use of a private correspondence had produced nothing of which I ought to be ashamed. If there were anything that I could now desire to have expunged, the wish was dictated by a feeling of pride which I think it meritorious to repress, without regretting any errors of sentiment into which I may have been betrayed by any warmth or cordiality of temper.

D. PORTER.

Extracts from, and references to, the President's messages to Congress, and the documents accompanying the same, in relation to the transactions of the squadron under command of Commodore Porter; all which are referred to in his defence, and requested to be taken as part thereof.

Extract from the President's message to Congress, at the commencement of the first session of the eighteenth Congress, December 2, 1823.

In the West Indies and the Gulf of Mexico, our naval force has been augmented, by the addition of several small vessels, provided for by the "act authorizing an additional naval force for the suppression of piracy," passed by Congress at their last session. That armament has been eminently successful in the accomplishment of its object. The piracies by which our commerce in the neighborhood of the Island of Cuba had been afflicted, have been repressed, and the confidence of our merchants in a great measure restored.

The patriotic zeal and enterprise of Commodore Porter, to whom the command of the expedition was confided, has been fully seconded by the officers and men under his command. And, in reflecting with high satisfaction on the honorable manner in which they have sustained the reputation of their country and its navy, the sentiment is alloyed only by a concern that, in the fulfillment of that arduous service, the diseases incident to the season and to the climate in which it was discharged, have deprived the nation of many useful lives, and among them, of several officers of great promise.

In the month of August, a very malignant fever made its appearance at Thompson's Island, which threatened the destruction of our station there. Many perished, and the commanding officer was severely attacked. Uncertain as to his fate, and knowing that most of the medical officers had been rendered incapable of discharging their duties, it was thought expedient to send to that post an officer of rank and experience, with several skillful surgeons, to ascertain the origin of the fever, and the probability of its recurrence there in future seasons; to furnish every assistance to those who were suffering, and, if practicable, to avoid the necessity of abandoning so important a station. Commodore Rodgers, with a promptitude which did him honor, cheerfully accepted that trust, and has discharged it in the manner anticipated from his skill and patriotism. Before his arrival, Commodore Porter, with the greater part of the squadron, had removed from the island, and returned to the United States, in consequence of the prevailing sickness. Much useful information has, however, been obtained as to the state of the island, and great relief afforded to those who had been necessarily left there.

Although our expedition, co-operating with an invigorated administration of the government of the Island of Cuba, and with the corresponding active exertions of a British naval force in the same seas, have almost entirely destroyed the unlicensed piracies from that island, the success of our exertions has not been equally effectual to suppress the same crime, under other pretences and colors, in the neighboring Island of Porto Rico. They have been committed there under the abusive issue of Spanish commissions. At an early period of the present year, remonstrances were made to the governor of that island, by an agent who was sent for the purpose, against those outrages on the peaceful commerce of the United States, of which many had occurred. That officer, professing his own want of authority to make satisfaction for our just complaints, answered only by a reference of them to the government of Spain. The minister of the United States to that court was specially instructed to urge the necessity of the immediate and effectual interposition of that government, directing restitution and indemnity for wrongs already committed, and interdicting the repetition of them. The minister, as has been seen, was debarred access to the Spanish government, and in the meantime several new cases of flagrant outrage have occurred, and citizens of the United States in the Island of Porto Rico have suffered, and others been threatened with assassination, for asserting their unquestionable rights, even before the lawful tribunals of the country.

On the western side of the Atlantic ocean, and in the Gulf of Mexico, the operations of our naval force have been more active. Several vessels were in commission there at the close of the last year. To these were added, under the authority of the law passed at the last session of Congress, "authorizing an additional force for the suppression of piracy," the steam galliot Sea Gull, eight small schooners, the Grayhound, Jackal, Fox, Wild Cat, Beagle, Ferret, Weasel, and Terrier; five barges, the Musquito, Gnat, Midge, Sandfly, and Gallinipper; and one transport ship, the Decoy.

Captain David Porter was appointed to the command of the squadron, and sailed from Norfolk about the tenth of February last. His station was at Thompson's Island, from which he dispatched his vessels in such way as he judged best suited to attain his objects. The annexed extracts from his letters and reports exhibit the results.

The size of most of the vessels, the nature of the duties, and the exposure of the officers and men, called for a display of perseverance and fortitude seldom required of those engaged in our service; but the call was well answered. Everything was accomplished which was anticipated from the expedition. Piracy, as a system, has been repressed in the neighborhood of the Island of Cuba, and now requires only to be watched by a proper force, to be prevented from afflicting commerce any further in that quarter. The public authorities of the Island of Cuba manifested a friendly disposition towards the squadron, and rendered much assistance in the pursuit of its objects.

On the 5th of March, as Lieutenant Cocke, in obedience to the orders of Captain Porter, was entering the harbor of St. Johns, Porto Rico, in the schooner Fox, he was killed by a shot from the castle. Extracts from the correspondence between Captain Porter and the government of the island, on this subject, are annexed.

The squadron was healthy and prosperous until about the middle of August, when a malignant fever broke out at the station and destroyed many valuable lives. The first reports of this calamity were brought to the Department on the 17th of September. At the time they left the island, Captain Porter and most of the medical officers were sick, and there was great cause to fear that the squadron would be deprived of its commanding officer and of the medical assistance necessary to its safety. Under these circumstances it was considered expedient to send to the station an officer of rank and experience, with a sufficient number of surgeons to furnish, in any event, the aid necessary for the safety and proper conduct of the squadron, with power to remove it should that be found necessary. Captain Rodgers cheerfully consented to encounter the hazard and responsibility attendant on such an expedition. He sailed from New York as soon as a vessel could be prepared for the purpose; but, before his arrival, Captain Porter had become convalescent, and, with the greater part of the squadron, had returned to the United States. The reports of these officers will fully explain their views of the causes of the disease, and the means by which a recurrence of it may be prevented.

It is believed, that the Florida station is incalculably important to some of the best interests of this Union; and that it ought not to be deserted until every expedient has failed to render it a secure and healthy position, for our vessels. I feel great confidence in the opinion that it may be made such, without encountering great hazard of the evils we have heretofore suffered.

For the protection of commerce, and the suppression of piracy, in the Western Atlantic and Gulf of Mexico, it is proposed, in the ensuing year, to continue Thompson's Island as the station for the vessels employed in those objects; to place there a ship of the line, armed and manned as a frigate, for which purpose the Independence is well fitted; and to attach to the command the John Adams and Hornet, and one other sloop-of-war, with four of the large schooners, the Grampus, Porpoise, Shark and Spark, one of the small schooners, and the barges. This force is competent to protect all our interests. The ship of the line, placed in a proper position, will afford comfortable accommodations to those who are obliged to remain at the station, and prevent the necessity of intercourse with the island when danger is suspected. The cruises of the other vessels, except those which visit the coast of Africa, may be limited to four, five or six weeks, and on their return, their crews may be exchanged for others, who, during the time, have been stationary. By these means, and a proper attention to cleanliness, both in the men and the vessels, and avoiding intercourse with places known to be sickly, the health of all will probably be preserved. For the proper execution of such a system, full reliance may be placed in our officers. The island itself, by clearing, draining, and cultivating, will, after a time, probably become more healthful.

It will be perceived, that this distribution of force includes only one of the small schooners. They were admirably calculated for the end for which they were purchased, and have effected it. But piracy being for the present, repressed, and requiring only such a force as will prevent its revival, they are no longer necessary; and, being both very expensive, and utterly subversive of all discipline, it is respectfully recommended that they be sold, retaining one for the present season; after which, it may be sold.

The force employed in the Gulf of Mexico, and in the neighboring seas, for the suppression of piracy, has likewise been preserved essentially, in the state in which it was during the last year. A persevering effort has been made for the accomplishment of that object, and much protection has thereby been afforded our commerce; but still the practice is far from being suppressed. From every view which has been taken of the subject, it is thought that it will be necessary rather to augment, than to diminish our force, in that quarter. There is reason to believe, that the piracies now complained of, are committed by bands of robbers, who inhabit the land, and who, by preserving good intelligence with the towns, and seizing favorable opportunities, rush forth, and fall on unprotected merchant vessels, of which they make an easy prey. The pillage thus taken, they carry to their lurking places, and dispose of afterwards, at prices tending to seduce the neighboring population. This combination is understood to be of great extent, and is the more to be deprecated, because the crime of piracy is often attended with the murder of the crews; these robbers knowing if any survived, their lurking places would be exposed, and they be caught and punished. That this atrocious practice should be carried to such extent, is cause of equal surprise and regret. It is presumed, that it must be attributed to the relaxed and feeble state of the local governments, since it is not doubted, from the high character of the Governor of Cuba, who is well known and much respected here, that if he had power he would promptly suppress it.

Extract from the report of the Secretary of the Navy to the President of the United States, December 1, 1824, accompanying the last message.

The manner in which the force assigned to the protection of our commerce and the suppression of piracy in the West Indies, has been employed, will be seen by the annexed letters and reports of Commodore Porter, marked C. The activity, zeal, and enterprise of our officers, have continued to command approbation. All the vessels have been kept uniformly and busily employed, where the danger was believed to be greatest, except for short periods, when the commander supposed it necessary that they should return to the United States, to receive provisions, repairs, and men, and for other objects essential to their health, comfort and efficiency.

No complaints have reached this Department, of injury from privateers of Porto Rico, or other Spanish possessions; nor have our cruisers found any violating our rights. A few small piratical vessels and some boats have been taken, and establishments broken up, and much salutary protection afforded to our commerce. The force employed, however, has been too small, constantly to watch every part of a coast, so extensive as that of the islands and shores of the Gulf of Mexico, and some piratical depredations have therefore been committed; but they are of a character, though, perhaps, not less bloody and fatal to the sufferers, yet differing widely from those which first excited the sympathy of the public, and exertions of the government. There are few, if any, piratical vessels of a large size in the neighborhood of Cuba, and none are now seen at a distance from the land. But the pirates conceal themselves, with their boats, in small creeks, bays and inlets, and finding vessels becalmed, or in a defenceless situation, assail and destroy them. When discovered, they readily and safely retreat into the country, where our forces cannot follow, and, by the plunder, which they have obtained, and which they sell at prices low and tempting to the population, and by the apprehensions which they are able to create in those who would otherwise give information, they remain secure, and mingle, at pleasure, in the business of the towns, and transactions of society, and acquire all the information necessary to accomplish their purposes. Against such a system, no naval force, within the control of this Department, can afford complete security, unless aided by the cordial, unwavering, and energetic co-operation of the local governments; a co-operation which would render their lurking places on land unsafe, and make punishment the certain consequence of detection. Unless this co-operation be obtained, additional means ought to be entrusted to the Executive, to be used in such manner as experience may dictate.
